The amendment now before us proposes that in all non-bailable cases there shall be a discretion with the Magistrate to allow the person to be released on bail. I do not know whether my Honourable friend would propose later on the omission of the proviso, for the proviso would be quite meaningless if he makes the first amendment. Well, now, my Honourable friends, Mr. Kamat and Dr. Gour, have both suggested that the reason why we take bail is to secure the attendance of the accused. I accept that suggestion entirely. I accept the dictum of Lord Russell of Killowen in the case of Regina versus Rose that "it cannot be too strongly urged upon Magistrates that bail is not intended to be punitive, but merely to secure the attendance of the prisoner at the trial, or to come up for judgment." I accept that as the proper test to be applied in these cases. But, Sir, how are you going to apply that test? The real question is, what are the considerations to be used in applying the test? And here, Sir, I cannot accept at all the suggestion of my Honourable friend, Dr. Gour, that the proposals in the Bill depart from the principles of the English law on the subject. The various rulings as to how the test laid down by Lord Chief Justice Russell of Killowen should be applied have been summarised as follows: The first test should be the nature of the accusation. That, Sir, is a very similar provision to the one which we have in the Bill. The next test is the nature of the evidence in support of the accusation. That, Sir, is an exactly corresponding provision to the words "reasonable grounds for believing" which my Honourable friend, Dr. Gour, takes so much exception.

so. The next consideration is the severity of the punishment which conviction will entail. It is quite clear, Sir, that if you have a case in which the punishment which will be inflicted is very severe, then it does not matter what bail you take; the man will try and get away.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: What is the next test? Is there no other test?

Mr. H. Tomkinson: The fourth test given in this leading English law book is whether the sureties are independent or indemnified by the accused. We have not got any provision of that kind. These are the only tests given and I submit, Sir, that they are exactly on the same lines as section 497 will be if amended as in the Bill. Let us see what the provisions of section 497 will be. As my Honourable friend Dr. Gour has pointed out, they are subject to section 498 under which a Court of Session or the High Court may release on bail in any case. Now, the Magistrate can in all non-bailable cases under this proposal release any person who is under the age of 16 years. He may in all non-bailable cases release any woman. He may in all non-bailable cases release any sick or infirm person. The only restriction is in the case of a man over the age of 16 years, who is not sick or infirm. If there are reasonable grounds for believing that that man is guilty of what offence? Of an offence punishable with death or transportation for life—then a Magistrate will not be able to release him on bail. I submit, it may be, and I agree myself, that the existing law in section 497 was unduly restrictive. But is it possible to say that in the conditions in India, these proposals in the Bill are unduly restrictive? Do we not, Sir, want to restrict our Magistrates to this extent? Even the best of our Magistrates make mistakes, and, as I have said, if there is a case which does not come within these provisions, it is always open to the accused to move a Court of Session or a High Court. I submit, Sir, that the proposals in the Bill should be accepted and that the amendment moved by my Honourable friend, Mr. Harchandrai Vishindas, should be rejected.

Colonel Sir Henry Stanyon: Sir, in the choice of several evils I venture to support this amendment. There is no question about it, in my humble opinion, that section 497, as at present law, is thoroughly bad. In sub-section (1) it invites the Magistrate to pre-judge against the defence. In sub-section (2) it invites the Magistrate to pre-judge against the prosecution. Sub-section (1) says: "he shall not be released if there appear reasonable grounds for believing that he has been guilty of the offence of which he is accused," and sub-section (2) says that he shall be released "if there are no reasonable grounds for believing that the accused has committed the offence." That is a wrong criterion in principle, and it has been disastrous in practice. Magistrates, who, in general, are people desirous of doing honest and straightforward justice, have refrained from forming these prejudices in regard to cases before them. The result has been that in non-bailable cases the granting of bail has been steadily refused, and many persons have been detained whom justice required to be put on bail for the purpose of putting up their defence, or because of their status and so on. Some Members of the House, and I include myself among them, have been criticised in the press for an undue leniency towards the criminal. That criticism seems to me to be wholly unfounded. It is not the duty of a Magistrate to pre-judge against the defence or the prosecution.

you provide punishment for a criminal. When you legislate a Criminal Procedure Code, you make law for the fair trial of a person who is presumably innocent until he is proved to be guilty. It has been admitted, in his very fair and impartial remarks on the subject, by my Honourable friend, Mr. Tonkinson, that the ground of arrest and detention of accused persons is simply and absolutely to secure that they shall duly appear to stand their trial. There is no other reason. The law should not ask the Court, until the whole of the evidence is before it, to form any opinion whatsoever on the merits. Hear both sides and then decide whether there are reasonable grounds for believing that the accused is guilty or not guilty. To the four considerations which have been put forward by Mr. Tonkinson in connection with the dictum of Lord Russel of Killowen I venture to mention a fifth, and that is, the status and circumstances of the person accused. A rich banker may be accused of embezzling Rs. 200. He may have large properties, his family, his home and everything that he would lose by absconding, and a good defence if he were allowed out on bail so that he could attend to it. But that is a case punishable with transportation for life and even under the amendment proposed in the Bill before us bail would be refused to such a man. That surely is one instance where without any technicality one's common sense perceives an injustice in the mode of procedure. What Judge or Magistrate or lawyer has not heard the zealous police officer, in perfect honesty and with the best of intentions say "If that accused is let out on bail I cannot prove my case." Is that a consideration which any Magistrate ought to be allowed to hear? Yet that is the kind of thing that is put before him under the present law upon applications made for bail. It is for these reasons that I would prefer the risk of leaving an unfettered discretion to the Magistrate to deal with each particular case upon all its merits—upon all the considerations which have been mentioned—what is the nature of the offence? What sort of evidence is disclosed? Has the accused confessed? What sort of man is he? Is he likely to run away? We should not specify these things or put them in a definition. They should remain available at the discretion of the Magistrate. We must instruct the Magistrate, and then let him exercise his discretion. Let that discretion be controlled by higher authority. I admit in matters of release on bail the higher authority may come rather late. But there are these difficulties in every direction and we have to meet them. We cannot aim at perfection but must do the best we can; and I think it is better to leave an absolute discretion to the Magistrate—a properly trained Magistrate—than to try and limit his discretion with such limitations as exist in the present law and as will continue to exist if we require him under the amendment proposed in the Bill, to pre-judge cases—the most serious cases of all, cases punishable with death or transportation for life. On these grounds I support the amendment.

Rai Bahadur S. N. Singh (Bihar and Orissa; Nominated Official): I rise to oppose this amendment. The present position is that in all non-bailable cases the accused person may be admitted to bail unless there are grounds for believing that he has been guilty of the offence of which he is accused. The amendment proposed in the Bill is to confine the refusal of bail to cases where the person is accused of an offence punishable with death or with transportation for life. The proposed provision is therefore a distinct improvement upon the existing position as the Honourable Mover of the amendment has himself admitted. And, Sir, there is a very wholesome provision to the effect that if the Magistrate at any stage of the proceeding or trial does not think that the accused has committed the offence, he can admit him to bail. The object of keeping an accused person in custody is not only to prevent him from running away but also to prevent him from committing mischief outside custody, such as tampering with the evidence available against him, which, Sir, he would be tempted to do in such cases of serious offences. For these reasons I hope this amendment will be turned down.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: I move that the question be now put.

Mr. P. B. Haign (Bombay: Nominated Official): Sir, I have listened with very great respect to the remarks by my Honourable friend, Sir Henry Stanyon, on the subject of this amendment, but I feel constrained, in spite of his long experience, to differ from him. In the first place, I think he argued most of his case on the wording of the old section. He asked the House to remember that this section had been used in such a way that bail was refused in many cases in which it might perfectly, safely and legitimately have been given, on account of the way in which that section was worded. The object of the amendment which has been put forward by the Joint Committee is to remove that very objection from the section. It is admitted that the section was previously too restricted, namely, where the Magistrate was of opinion or had reasonable grounds for supposing that the accused had committed any non-bailable offence, bail should not be granted. But we are now confronted with a very different position. The number of offences in which bail cannot be granted under those provisions has now been very greatly reduced, and the question now before the House is whether an absolute discretion should be given to Magistrates in all cases or not. Well, with all respect to the opinion of my Honourable friend, Mr. Tonkinson, I would suggest in this country there must be some other considerations besides the mere appearance of the accused. (Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: "Why in this country?") In this country, because we are at present concerned with this country. I would ask my Honourable friend, Mr. Kamat, for example, whether he thinks it is really safe that when a murder has been committed and when a man has been arrested actually in the commission of the offence and is brought before the Court, a discretion should be given to the Magistrate even in such a case to allow the man to be released on bail. There are many cases in which it is obviously most dangerous that it should be possible for an accused in those circumstances to be let free; and, further, Honourable Members who support this amendment have persistently ignored the fact referred to by the Honourable Mr. Tonkinson that they, all of them, all accused in such cases, have an immediate remedy under section 498. They do not even require to go to the High Court; an immediate reference can be made to the Court of Session, and I submit, Sir, that that is a quite sufficient remedy in all cases of so grave a nature as are referred to in the sub-section as amended. Then, Sir, there is another argument which has been used both by Dr. Gour and Sir John Stanyon that the Magistrate has to prejudge the case because he is not to grant bail when there appear reasonable grounds for believing that the accused has been guilty of the offence of which he has been accused. Now, I submit, Sir, that it is not fair to say that this means that the Magistrate must prejudge the case. It merely means that on the evidence that is brought before him, he must see whether there is a prima facie ground for supposing that it is reasonable that this man is possibly guilty of this offence. That is quite a different matter from an actual judgment on the case.

Dr. H. S. Gour: It is a belief.

Mr. P. B. Haigh: I did not catch the observation.

Dr. H. S. Gour: There are reasonable grounds for believing.

Mr. P. B. Haigh: Exactly, it is a mere belief. He has not to come to a decision on the point, he has merely got to believe that there are reasonable grounds,—that is to say that the grounds that are put forward when the accused is brought there are such that he may reasonably believe that the accused has committed the offence; it commits him to nothing, and I do not believe that in actual practice Magistrates have been hampered by the provisions of this section. Dr. Gour has asked the Government to meet the Honourable Members on the other side half-way, and I submit this is exactly what this clause as now amended by the Bill does: had the clause been omitted as is now proposed by the other side, they would not have gone half-way but the whole way: Government have accepted the recommendations made by the Select Committee that the old provisions are too restrictive, and they are prepared to remove them, except in the case of specified offences of a very grave nature, and I submit that you could not possibly have a fairer compromise than that, and that in going so far, the Government may be said to have gone exactly half-way. Sir, I oppose this amendment.

Sr Henry Moncrieff Smith: Sir, I do not agree with my Honourable friend, Mr. Haigh, that Government has gone half-way. Government has gone very nearly the whole way. I think I should make the position of Government clear to the House; and it is this—they view this matter with the very gravest concern. Those Members of the Joint Committee who attended its meetings—and Mr. Harchandrai was not one of those—will know how very seriously this matter was argued, and how the Government's point of view was put forward, and how the Honourable the Home Member of that time attempted to persuade the Joint Committee not to go as far as they did,—and how he tried to persuade them to introduce some sort of safeguard in this matter. I only want to make it quite clear to the House, Sir, that Government does view this particular question of bail in non-bailable cases with the gravest concern. I have a few remarks to add to what Mr. Haigh has said on the subject of pre-judging. Now, Sir, in the first place, the words 'having reasonable grounds for believing,' I would ask the House to remember, will only apply to a very limited class of cases; they will not apply to cases punishable with transportation or death, and, therefore, the Magistrate himself, Sir, will ordinarily not be able to try them and will not have to pre-judge the cases at all, any more than he has to pre-judge the case when he has to make up his mind whether he is going to commit the accused or not. He has to do exactly the same thing in this case, as Mr. Haigh has said,—he has to decide whether there is a prima facie case against the accused or not; and if the Magistrate thinks that there is a prima facie case against the accused, he commits the accused for trial. But he will not be pre-judging the case even to that extent if he says that this is not a case in which bail should be allowed. Now, Sir, we heard a good deal about the one criterion that should be applied in this case,—and that is, whether the accused is likely to abscond or not. We heard it suggested that there are non-bailable offences which are committed by persons hitherto most respectable, and those persons will not be likely to run away, and, therefore, there is no need whatever in these cases to impose any restriction on the discretion of the Courts. Sir, we have got to examine this matter from both sides. The House is proposing to enable a stupid Magistrate—and there are stupid Magistrates—a weak Magistrate—and there are weak Magistrates—to let out on bail at once a murderer caught red-handed, a ducoit who has been terrorising his district for five years, who has been caught with the greatest of difficulty; you take him before a weak Magistrate, and you get bail at once,—and the reign of terror proceeds again for another five years before he is caught. There is one very important point which has not been mentioned in this debate at all. The whole question has been argued from the point of view of the Courts. Now if the House will look at section 497, they will find that it deals not only with the question of bail before the Courts but it deals with the question of bail by police officers too, and, here, Sir, is the House seriously proposing to give a police officer full powers to release on bail a person accused of the most serious offence, without giving him any discretion or any guidance as to the way he should exercise those powers? Sir, is it not a very dangerous thing to do? Police officers, we have been told over and over again in the course of this debate, are not always honest, are corrupt; and when it is a question of a very rich man in custody—I understand it is the very rich man that the House is feeling so seriously about—of the very rich man whom the House wants to be released on bail because he can afford to pay and because he has been hitherto respectable, will that man not be able to make it worth the while of the police officer to let him go, and will you ever again catch that man? There is no question about it, that he will never be caught again. The criterion of the likelihood of the accused absconding is a very sound criterion, but if you take the clause as is proposed by the Bill, we are not trenching upon that criterion at all. You take the most serious offences, those punishable with transportation and those punishable with death. Can any Magistrate, any Court, say to itself that the accused person brought before him, who, it has reasonable grounds to believe, has rendered himself liable to the punishment of transportation for life or liable to the punishment of death, is not likely to take an opportunity of absconding? One Honourable Member has suggested that once you get bail,—that is all you want, I think it was Dr. Gour,—what more security do you want than bail that he will appear? Sir, will a murderer, a ducoit, be bound by any tender feelings for his friend who has stood surety for him? Will he, Sir, say to himself: ‘my friend stood by me, he has got me out on bail, I must not let him down, I will surrender to the Court, and I will be hanged’? Sir, I do not think a criminal in this country, or the innocent person on his trial in this country as Sir Henry Stanyon has said, is likely to be affected by any considerations of that sort.

Sir Montagu Webb (Bombay: European): I move that the question be now put.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

“In clause 132 (i), omit the words from ‘in sub-section (1)’ to the word ‘substituted’ and in their place substitute the following:

‘in sub-section (1) the words beginning with the words ‘but he shall not be’ to the end of the sub-section shall be omitted’.”

The question I have to put is that that amendment be made.

The Assembly re-assembled after Lunch at Ten Minutes to Three of the Clock. Mr. President was in the Chair.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Sir, we have discussed this question at considerable length, and I need only say a few words in commending my amendment No. 352, which as Honourable Members will see from page 46 is as follows:

"In clause 132 (i), after the words 'for life' insert the following:

'and that the accused if released on bail would abscond and attempt to escape justice by avoiding or delaying an inquiry or trial'."

Honourable Members if they read the section will see how it has been amended by the Joint Committee. We have to acknowledge that considerable improvement has been made in the existing provision relating to bails. We acknowledge it with thanks. But at the same time the existing defects in the law, as forcibly pointed out by my Honourable friend, Sir Henry Stanyon, still remain in the most serious of cases, namely, offences punishable with death or transportation for life. If Honourable Members will just glance through the Schedule attached to the Code of Criminal Procedure they will find all sorts of offences which are punished with transportation for life—I counted about 47 this morning and I do not know if there are not more, I have not made an exhaustive count—ranging from criminal breach of trust to offences against the State. Therefore, Sir, it is refreshing to hear from the Treasury Benches an expression of the sentiments of which we have been gravely accused by the Anglo-Indian Press, that the Indian politicians betray such a lack of trust in the police and the magistracy that they do not realise their sense of responsibility, that they hold them up to ridicule and that the full measure of reforms for which they are yearning cannot come because of this over-distrust of the magistracy and the police. I am glad to have our sentiments echoed from the Treasury Benches. Sir, this morning we heard there are stupid magistrates, there are weak magistrates. Which is the more important? Is the accused to suffer at the hands of stupid magistrates or the prosecution to suffer? Is the accused to suffer at the hands of weak magistrates or the prosecution to suffer? That is our complaint. There are weak magistrates, and they succumb to the influences to the subtle influences, to the unseen influences at work, in order to get convictions. To borrow the phrase of my Honourable friend, Mr. Haigh, this is an unfortunate country. Everything must be different in this unfortunate country. I do not know why. I interjected a remark "why in this country?" My Honourable friend said "We live in this country." He had no other reason to give. As Sir Henry Stanyon pointed out, people should be presumed to be innocent until they are actually convicted by the Judge, Magistrate or jury as the case may be. That is a wholesome principle known to every system of civilised jurisprudence. If the Government will furnish the figures which they have of persons lodged in jail or in custody pending trial and afterwards eventually acquitted either by the trying judge or by the court of appeal, Government will, I daresay, repent, will have serious cause to repent, at the rigour of the existing provisions regarding bail. Even in England more than 50 per cent. of persons who are detained in custody pending trial because they are not able to find bail are eventually acquitted after detention in jail for three or four months pending the sessions trial. If that is so in England, much more so in this country. I wish the Government would give us the figures of people who are kept in custody pending trial and are eventually acquitted. Can they give us the figures for last year? Take any province. The figures of people who are eventually acquitted after being accused of crimes and yet kept in jail pending the trial will reveal an appalling number of persons, innocent persons kept in custody. Sir, they are deprived of their earnings in the meanwhile. Do we compensate these persons who are kept in jail? Do we provide for the maintenance of the families of those persons who are kept in jail? Therefore it seems somewhat odd that people should stand up here to defend the present system by which the discretion of the magistrate is sought to be tied down. Sir, we lost that amendment about leaving it to the good sense of the magistrate to see which case he should let on bail and which case he should not. Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith mentioned, I think, the case of a person caught red-handed committing a murder with the bloody instrument in his hand and asked "Is he to be let out on bail?" I say "No. Your magistrate will not let him out on bail, if he is a magistrate whom you have properly appointed." But if you appoint weak magistrates, stupid magistrates, that is no reason why the law should be stupid, because your magistrates are stupid. Therefore that is no answer at all to a case of this sort. The provision as it stands says in effect, "Do not release him on bail if you have reasonable grounds for believing that he is guilty of an offence punishable with death or transportation for life." It is true that in such cases the magistrate does not actually convict; Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith is quite right in saying that such cases will probably go to the sessions court; not necessarily however; first class magistrates may deal with such cases and convict them of offences—although they may be charged with other offences—within their jurisdiction. But leaving it there, even as a com-

[Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar.]

3 P.M. mitting Magistrate he has to come to a judicial conclusion as to whether a prima facie case is made out or not before he commits the accused to stand his trial in the Sessions Court. You are now forcing his hands by the section as it stands to come to a conclusion before he has seen the witnesses,—because Honourable Members will notice this comes just at the time either when he is brought in custody or when he appears in Court—you are forcing his hands, even before a single witness is put in the witness box, to come to a conclusion. He simply sees the police diary or the police version or the prosecution version of the case, and he is asked to come to a conclusion beforehand that he has reasonable grounds for believing the man to be guilty. Sir, that is asking him too much. It is asking him to do injustice to the accused beforehand. Therefore it is not a good condition to impose; any way it is there.

Now you want to give one direction to the Magistrate under the clause as it stands. I want to impose another direction, an additional direction, namely, that not only should he have grounds for believing that he is guilty of an offence punishable with death or transportation but he should also be satisfied that if let on bail the accused is likely to evade justice. I won't say that is the only consideration, but that should be the main consideration as the Honourable Mr. Tonkinson very fairly admitted. The primary ground for consideration at this stage should be whether this man is likely to evade justice.

My Honourable friend, Mr. Samarth, interposed with a remark 'what about suicides'? I provide for it. If the Magistrate is satisfied on account of the nature of the case, or on account of the temperament of the individual or on account of the gravity of the sentence which may be imposed upon him that a particular accused is likely to commit suicide, then he evades justice, and my amendment safeguards that doubt, and I hope my honourable friend Mr. Samarth will have no more doubt in his mind in supporting my amendment. Sir, that ought to be the test, the only test which civilized countries should impose. Let us not be guided away by the vague expressions about this unfortunate country. Unfortunately my Anglo-Indian friends present here think that this country is peculiar—I hope not all of them will think so. We have got a very good exception in my Honourable friend Sir Henry Stanyon, and I hope others will join his rank. Sir, as the Government feel strongly in this matter, we also feel strongly. Let us not be guided away or led away by those who say 'Oh, the Government feel very strongly in this matter'. People attach the greatest importance that their liberties should not be deprived before they are convicted. At the slightest provocation Magistrates have shut up persons in custody. Poor fellows are unable to defend themselves. All sorts of conditions are imposed. They have to interview their pleader in the presence of a jailor. What instructions can the accused give under such conditions? Therefore, Sir, it is not right. We should give a fair trial and all opportunities to the accused to defend himself. He has got money, probably he is the only member, the only adult male member of the family who can raise money, while you shut him up in gaol; and what is he to do? Are you giving him really a fair trial by shutting him up like that? Therefore I say here 'A Magistrate shall not release an accused if he is satisfied that he is likely to evade justice and that there are reasonable grounds for believing him to be guilty'. Therefore, I don't allow full discretion to the Magistrate. I say if you control it do so with proper safeguards. Do not make it compulsory on him to refuse bail simply because he thinks there are reasonable grounds for believing the accused to be guilty. But let there be an additional safeguard, namely, only if he is further satisfied that the accused is likely to evade justice then alone he should refuse. Sir, I move my amendment.

Rao Bahadur C. S. Subrahmanayam (Madras ceded districts and Chittoor: Non-Muhammadian Rural): Sir, in the discussion of this matter, I am afraid certain considerations which are not strictly relevant have been introduced. First, I should like to deal with that expression "reasonable grounds for believing that he has been guilty of offence". Now you may make too much of it, but it has never been understood to mean that a Magistrate has come to the conclusion that the man is guilty. The significance of that expression must be considered when taken with the Court with which we are dealing with in this clause. It is the Court of the Magistrate, not the Court of the Judge who is going to try the offender. That distinction should at once appeal to those who are engaged in the administration of law. That is, the man who is inquiring into the case punishable with death or transportation for life is not the authority who is going to decide as to the guilt of the offender. He only collects the evidence, puts it together and then sends up the evidence and the accused to a higher Court for trial, if he feels that the case ought to be inquired into by a higher Court and not thrown out at once. So, when you take that clause with reference to the authority that is going to apply it, then I think all the argument that the Court is going to prejudge the case falls to the ground. How is it to prejudge? What materials has it to come to a conclusion? I think, with all deference, that difficulty must vanish. Because, after all, the Magistrates are human just as we are. They have got certain reports and depositions. They must in a sense come to some conclusion. If it is not an extreme case, like the one put by Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith of a man caught red-handed, but if there is plenty of evidence that the man has committed murder, no Magistrate, whatever the form of law may be, can shut his eyes or shut his mind and say that the man is innocent. Why, even Judges who try cases, when they start on a case, before going through the evidence, form some kind of first impressions. But their intellectual training, their culture makes them separate the two, separate their first impressions from the final conclusion which they are bound to come to after hearing the evidence, and we must assume in this discussion that the men have got some intellectual calibre, some training in sifting evidence and dealing with cases. If we look at it in that light, I think much of the argument that has been levelled at that clause and the psychological difficulties that that clause would introduce will disappear.

Now Sir, the clause which my friend, Mr. Rangachariar wants to introduce is a clause which will work considerable hardship on the accused themselves. Now, I will tell you. Pause for a moment and consider how a Magistrate is to decide whether the man will escape and avoid justice.

It depends on the temperament of the accused. A very sensitive man, a man who feels the disgrace of a possible conviction and has worked himself to a desperate state of mind, possibly may run away and may go and drown himself or poison himself. Therefore, what criterion do you provide for a Magistrate to find out whether the accused person is a man who will escape (and therefore he will not give him bail) or he is a man who will not escape (and therefore he will give him bail). Is it easy for any Magistrate to come to a conclusion on that clause? Probably this clause will work hardship and I will presently show how it will work hardship. Suppose there is not a very wealthy man but an ordinarily wealthy man. The Magistrate will say, "If I leave this man he would recompense or recuperate the men who have stood as sureties and will run away to some other territory and abscond. Therefore he must be kept in jail." The consideration which will weigh with Magistrates or Courts in letting a man on bail is that he is a respectable man, a man of property and he will not run away. But if you put this clause in the Statute, if, as has been said oftentimes, you crystallise what is a ground of discretion by a clause in the Statute, you run the danger of people who are now getting bail being refused bail, because the Magistrate might say, "He is a respectable man, honourably connected, having respectable relations and leading a respectable life." Probably the disgrace that will follow as a result of the trial might drive him to desperation. Therefore I will keep him in jail." He might say that. While you are getting hold of one extreme, you ought also to consider the other extreme to which this clause will lead. Therefore, this clause is a dangerous clause to tack on to the section, I think as far as Sessions Courts and the High Courts are concerned, barring individual idiosyncrasies, no Legislature can correct them. These Courts generally are inclined to let people on bail on reading the depositions and on seeing the facts before them. As to Magistrates, that is a different business. One thing which I have frequently noticed in the discussion of the various provisions of the Code is not the defect in the law, not the defect in the terms of the law or the enunciation of the law, but in the actual working of the law in the lower courts, and for that, all I can say is that the executive governments of the various provinces are responsible. There is a habit—I mention that in order to make the Assembly understand how it is that such a dead set is made against the Criminal Procedure Code—there is a habit in every Local Government to issue circulars behind the back of the High Courts, circulars which have nothing to do with the recorded decisions and reported decisions of courts. Every Local Government, the District Magistrate, issues circulars saying "You ought to be careful not to let people indiscriminately on bail." I mean some circulars are issued in the form of instructions to subordinate Magistrates who undoubtedly depend for their advancement on the head of the District, circumscribing the discretion vested in them by the law. It is that that is at the root of all the criticism which we have heard here. It is not against the authors of the present Code or the old Code which has been transmitted to us these sixty or seventy years by eminent jurists and lawyers. There is nothing wrong in the language of the Code. When we tried to tack on words to the Code, I sat down in great sorrow at the language which has stood the test of years and years being mangled here, and probably the consequences may be dire in the future interpretation of this section. But the cause of all the trouble which you have been hearing, Sir, is that the executive governments in the various provinces, ignoring the decisions or the interpretations of the High Courts of the actual provisions of the Code, have been issuing circulars tightening the provisions of the Code and enjoining upon subordinate Magistrates not to exercise a free discretion in the administration of Justice. It is those circulars that have been at the bottom of all these criticisms. I say we here cannot prevent the issuing of the circulars there. It should be a matter for the provinces, for the Provincial Councils to take note of such circulars, bring them up before the local Legislative Councils and see that they are not issued. If you go and mangle the law and add clause after clause to sections which are the result of the labours of very eminent lawyers, jurists and administrators, I am very much afraid that the result will not be what we all heartily desire. The clause, as it stands, gives sufficient discretion for letting off an accused on bail, and if this amendment be introduced, it will cause great trouble. This question of escape is a dictum of the Judges and that dictum is followed in the Higher Courts, but in the Magistrates' Courts it is not followed. I do not see how you can expect a Magistrate to follow that dictum and ask him to follow these dicta and to exercise his discretion this way or that way frequently when the accused is under trial. Why should we assume that in every case the accused person before trial is an innocent man. It is all judicially speaking quite right, but why in the discussion of a provision in the Legislature do you start with the ground that the case is false, that an innocent man has been falsely charged? Is that not an extreme way of looking at the thing?

The case is under inquiry, and so long as it is under inquiry,—it may take a few weeks, and in some difficult cases it may be 2 or 3 months—there must be hardship. That hardship you cannot avoid by any number of clauses in the statute. You cannot prevent one man prosecuting another man, you cannot prevent a policeman making a false charge. You can only await the result of the trial and take such remedies as the law provides. But if you go and mangle these provisions here, I do not think you will thereby be helping a large class of men who are now treated fairly by the Courts. Take the extreme limit of transportation for life. I do not think for a moment that a man who is accused with an offence punishable with death is going to be asked to be let off on bail, but even in such cases after the evidence is concluded and recorded, the Courts have let the men off on bail pending trial. I know such cases from my own experience. Therefore, I do not think that the weakening of this clause will do any good. Therefore I oppose the amendment of my Honourable friend, Mr. Rangachariar.

Mr. H. E. Holme (United Provinces: Nominated official): Sir, with due respect it seems to me that the proposed amendment must be either useless or mischievous, for either the Magistrate will decide on general principles that there is a danger of the accused absconding and evading justice in which case the words will be unnecessary, or else he will consider it his duty not to refuse to release the accused on bail unless and until he has satisfied himself that it is positively proved that the accused is likely to abscond and to hold that if in any case that cannot be said, the accused must be released on bail. As regards the argument that it is necessary for an accused to be at liberty during the trial in order to instruct his Counsel properly and to conduct his case, that argument would apply even if there were a danger of his absconding and therefore it does not seem to be conclusive. As regards the fear expressed that the Magistrate will have to prejudice the case, I should like to point out that, as matters stand, every Court has to, if the word is an appropriate one, provisionally prejudice the case at every stage. The Magistrate has to bear in mind all through the possibility of its being his duty to discharge the accused at any stage before the charge is framed. The framing of a charge is itself a kind of prejudging, because it implies that if the accused does not cross-examine the witnesses or put in a defence, he will be convicted. As regards the apprehension expressed that many offences punishable with transportation for life are not offences in respect of which bail should be refused, that would be an argument against their being designated non-bailable in the Penal Code; and as regards the instance put forward by an Honourable Member, in many such cases the "respectable" man will be the most likely to abscond, as has often been seen in the case of rich bankers charged with embezzlement. In conclusion, I would deprecate too much attention being paid to the argument that anything which is objectionable to the speaker is opposed to the laws of all civilized countries. We have not before us the laws of all civilized countries, and even if we had, it would be unsafe to conclude that they would be incapable of improvement. Sir, I oppose the amendment.

Mr. J. N. Mukherjee (Calcutta Suburbs: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Sir, I rise to support the amendment: After hearing my Honourable friend, the Mover of the amendment, I thought it would not be necessary to supplement his observations by anything that I might add to the discussion. But his speech has been followed by certain others, and owing to the new points which were intended to be made in the course of the debate, I feel I ought to say a word or two in reply to what has fallen from some of my Honourable friends. The first point that I take is that the amendment has been described as either mischievous or unnecessary. Now, Sir, if the matter of granting or withholding bail had been left entirely open for the exercise of free discretion by the Magistrate, we might say that the amendment could be taken as an attempt to restrict the exercise of such discretion. There might be some danger in that. But, as a matter of fact, we are now laying down certain lines along which we ask the Magistrate to exercise his discretion, and we are at present concerned with those lines and those lines alone. Now, it is perfectly clear that the amendment of section 497, Criminal Procedure Code, which the Treasury Benches have proposed is undoubtedly a great improvement upon the law as it originally stood and we are thankful for it. But even with that improvement, the question still remains whether the demands of justice have been fully satisfied thereby. Now, Sir, some objection has been raised on the ground that we should not have any feeling of tenderness for an accused person, and that any too wide a statement or proposition like the one stated above, is injurious to the interests of justice. But, we cannot help it after all. The British system is such that you must presume that a person who has been accused of an offence must be taken to be innocent until proof of his offence has been brought home to him. We cannot help it. We all have to act on that principle and the amendment proposed is only an attempt to give effect to that principle. The various amendments which have been proposed with regard to clause 132 of the Bill, are attempts to improve the amendment of the law brought forward by the Government Bill, still further. Now, Sir, what are the facts? What have we done by proposing the further amendments? We have in a manner indicated that in all cases punishable with transportation or death, the Magistrate shall not release the offender only if there appear reasonable grounds to believe that he has been guilty of an offence punishable with death or transportation for life. Now what we have got to consider is whether we should generalise the two classes of offences in that way and by so doing, include cases which ought to be left out of the category in question. My Honourable friend, Mr. Rangachariar, has already invited the attention of the House to the fact that offences in the Penal Code which are punishable with transportation for life are, some of them, triable by Magistrates and not by Sessions Courts, alone. I have examined some of the sections of the Penal Code. For instance, we might take section 409, criminal breach of trust as a public servant, etc.; section 394, hurt caused in committing or attempting to commit robbery, 326, grievous hurt caused with a dangerous weapon; offences relating to coins; and many others might be discovered which are triable by Magistrates also. If they are examined, generally speaking, it will be clear that the determination of the offence in a criminal case depends very often upon ascertainment of facts by a tedious process of examination of evidence. So that, if we brought all these cases contemplated by the Bill under careful examination, it will appear that the Magistrate in considering the question of bail will be often handicapped in the exercise of his discretion, if we lay down the law in the manner the Bill proposes to do. Now, Sir, it may be different where a murderer is caught red-handed. In such a case I think it will be the plain duty of the Magistrate not to give bail. But very often we find that murderers and people accused of other heinous offences are acquitted after trial. Therefore, if we hamper the exercise of the Magistrate's discretion in the way suggested by the Bill, we shall not be working justice in many cases, by shutting out bail; and the result will be such as has been pointed out by my Honourable friend, Mr. Rangachariar. Now, Sir, we take up the case of the police officer. It has been suggested by the Treasury Benches that we contemplate in section 497 of the Code, not only Courts but police officers as well. But what can a police officer do in these cases? He can only keep an accused person in custody for 24 hours. After that he has got to take him before a Magistrate, and an order has to be obtained by him for a remand. So that, that is the chief point to be considered with reference to police officers. He is practically unable to do mischief in such cases. In the second place we have got to consider that an undue exercise of favour in respect of an accused person for reasons best known to the police officer, in the matter of bail, will be regulated, if I may say so, by the fact that, if he (the police officer) has to send up an accused person, he will have to say that a good case has been made out against him. Well, in the same breath he cannot say "I find good reasons for letting him off on bail." Either he has got to say that no prima facie case has been made out against the accused person, or that such a case has not been made out. Therefore, I submit that the mischief which is apprehended in the case of police officers is not at all a likely event. I submit, Sir, the question of the police officer in this connection may be safely left out of consideration, under the circumstances.

As regards the question of a Magistrate believing, or making up its mind as to an alleged offence, before the conclusion of the trial, I may say, as has been already pointed out, that in the matter of framing a charge by a Magistrate preliminary to commitment, as also in a case triable exclusively by a Court of Session, the law requires that the Magistrate should exercise his discretion in the matter. We have been led into psychological considerations such as those which have emanated from my Honourable friend, Mr. Subrahmanayam. But is there not such a thing as unconscious cerebration? A Magistrate at first sight comes to believe certain things.

Although the impression he then forms may not remain in his mind in a definite form, yet it may, all the same, work imperceptibly in his mind. The principle of the English law is such that it endeavours to place a Magistrate in a situation where things like the above may not work upon his mind at all. Therefore, Sir, wherever it is possible we should always try not to assume that an accused person is guilty before he is proved to be so, on the principle that an accused person is not guilty until his guilt is established. I submit, Sir, here is a case for the accused, with regard to the question of bail. What we have got to consider is—and the deciding factor in the case should always be, whether we are hampering the defence by unnecessarily restraining his movements;—unnecessarily, I say, only in such cases where he is a person who is sure not to try and escape justice. Where he is expected to do so, we shall be justified in putting a restraint upon his liberty of action; in other cases it will help justice if his movements are not restricted during trial. In such matters, the case is always one of balancing advantages against disadvantages. No proposition I may, perhaps, say, can be stated which is not open to criticism; but in all cases of the kind we have in view, we have got to judge between the two opposite aspects of the question, and the determining factor in the present instance, as I have said, ought to be the principle which has been so clearly accepted by the Honourable Mr. Tonkinson, and the principle which was so clearly enunciated by my Honourable friend to my left, Colonel Stanyon. Sir, if all the pros and cons of the question be taken into consideration, it will be clear that the supposed criminality of an accused person should not be brought into the scale at all, in granting him bail, supposing that a preconceived criminality of an accused person can influence the mind of a Judge. We make law in order that Magistrates may follow it, and therefore if the law is such that it will restrict the free exercise of the discretion of a Magistrate we ought not to have it. We should try and facilitate its free exercise in such cases and not restrict it by saying "In such and such a case you might not grant bail," though justice might require otherwise. That is the view, Sir, this House ought to take in the matter.

The Honourable Dr. Mian Sir Muhammad Shafi (Law Member): In forming a correct judgment upon this and the cognate amendments, I venture to submit it is necessary for Honourable Members to bear certain considerations in mind. In the first place, it must be borne in mind that the very classification of offences into bailable and non-bailable implies certain essential considerations. Offences which are comparatively insignificant or of less importance have by law been made bailable. In all those cases the accused is to be allowed his liberty after the institution of the prosecution until he is found guilty and has been convicted of the offence, the particular offence with which he may be charged. On the other hand as regards non-bailable offences it must be borne in mind that these are offences of a more serious character in so far as law and order and maintenance of peace in the country are concerned. That is the very reason, the basis of this class of offences being made non-bailable. That consideration, I respectfully submit, ought to be borne in mind. Again these non-bailable offences may in themselves be possessed of varying degrees of seriousness, some of less importance in so far as public tranquillity and law and order are concerned, and others of more seriousness and of greater importance. And of all these more serious offences it is obvious that the class of offences for which the Legislature has made capital punishment or life imprisonment as a punishment adequate or desirable.

must in the very nature of things be regarded as the most serious. In the amendment which we ourselves have introduced into this section it will be noticed that we have made this last class of offences, the most serious of all offences, as the exception, in so far as grant of bail even in the case of non-bailable offences is concerned. I would ask Honourable Members to bear this fact in mind.

In the second place, let us turn to the actual effect of the amended section as it will stand, should this House accept the amendment which we have proposed and reject the amendments which certain non-official Members have put forward. What will be its effect? While in the existing state of law in respect of all non-bailable offences before a court the court is given discretion to release an accused person on bail, nevertheless it is laid down that in all non-bailable cases the court shall not let an accused person out on bail if certain circumstances specified in the present section exist. In the amendment which we propose in the case of certain classes of accused persons mentioned in the proviso we give the fullest possible discretion to the Magistrate, no matter how serious may be the offence with which such accused person may be charged, to release these accused persons on bail. It is only in the case of a limited number even of this class of persons that we ask the House to lay down that an accused person shall not be let out on bail. And, Sir, in this connection permit me to invite attention to this fact that cases before a Magistrate may either be cases with reference to which he himself has exclusive jurisdiction to try, that is to say, his functions are not limited to what is known as a preliminary inquiry before commitment and also cases in which his functions are so limited. In the case of those offences the trial of which ultimately will be held either in the Sessions Court or in the High Court, as the case may be, his functions are merely limited to what is known as the preliminary inquiry before commitment. Now there is nothing in the amended section as we propose to prevent the Magistrate from letting an accused person out on bail in all such cases until a certain stage. When a certain stage has arisen, that is to say, when on the evidence before him there is reason to believe that the accused person has committed the offence, it is only then that there is an express prohibition that he shall not release the accused person on bail. I see my Honourable friends, Dr. Gour and Rao Bahadur Rangachariar, shake their heads. Let me make the position clear. Now section 497 as amended will run as follows: "When any person is accused of a non-bailable offence is arrested or detained without warrant by an officer in charge of a police station"—let us eliminate that for the moment—"or appears or is brought before a Court, he may be released on bail, but he shall not be so released if there appear reasonable grounds for believing that he has been guilty of an offence punishable with death or transportation for life."

Dr. H. S. Gour: When he is brought before the Court.

The Honourable Dr. Mian Sir Muhammad Shafi: Just one minute. As soon as he is brought before the Court, the Court has the fullest power to release him on bail, but he shall not be released if certain circumstances exist, that is to say, if the Court,—may be upon perusal of the police inquiry, may be after taking a certain amount of evidence actually produced before him in Court—has reason to believe that the accused has committed the offence, it is then and then alone that we lay down this prohibition that the accused shall not be so released. At what stage of the inquiry or of the case the mind of the Court will, with relation to the commission of the offence, reach the position, i.e., believe that the accused has committed the offence, will depend upon the circumstances of each case. That exact position, the mental position so far as the Court is concerned may, as I said just now, be reached at the very first instance, that is to say, after perusing the record of the police investigation or hearing the complainant or it may be reached after half the evidence for the prosecution has been heard or it may be reached right at the end of the inquiry, i.e., when the whole of the evidence has been recorded. But as soon as that position has been reached, the prohibition embodied in this clause comes in. Until that position has been reached, there is nothing to prevent the Magistrate from letting an accused person out on bail even in most serious cases. If this were not the correct interpretation of the clause as we propose—after all, remember that all penal enactments must be construed as far as reasonably may be in favour of the accused person—that is a well known principle of law,—and if the interpretation which my Honourable friends, Dr. Gour and Rao Bahadur Rangachariar, seek to place upon this were to be the correct interpretation, I am afraid you would be driving a coach and four through that principle of interpretation to which I have just referred. If this were not the correct interpretation, then what is the meaning of those words “he may be released on bail”? Those words become absolutely meaningless. If the intention is that in all cases where the police thinks that an accused person has committed an offence and have sent a man up for trial, the Magistrate also is bound ipso facto to believe that the accused has committed the offence, then what is the meaning of those words “he may release the accused person on bail”? As I said those words become absolutely meaningless. No, Sir. I venture to submit the intention is this, that the Magistrate has discretion in all non-bailable cases to let an accused person out on bail, even though the offences are non-bailable, but, as soon as, from the facts of the case, from the evidence placed before him or from the circumstances with which he has already become acquainted from the record of the case, he has reason to believe that the accused has committed an offence, it is then and then only that his hands are tied; he no longer possesses any discretion. He must then refuse to release the accused person on bail. And in this connection, let me invite attention to the careful manner in which this clause is drafted. What is the language? It is this: “If there appear reasonable grounds for believing that he has been guilty of an offence punishable with death or transportation for life.” Compare the phraseology adopted in this with the phraseology adopted in, say, section 254 of the Criminal Procedure Code, which relates to the framing of charges in warrant cases against the accused. Now, what is the phraseology adopted in this section 254? Section 254 says:

“If, when such evidence and examination have been made or at any previous stage of the case, the Magistrate is of opinion that there is ground for presuming that the accused has committed an offence, then he shall frame a charge.”

Now, if you compare the phraseology adopted in 497, “there appear reasonable grounds for believing that he has been guilty of the offence” with this, it is obvious, at any rate to my mind that the stage contemplated is the stage of a prima facie case having been established against the accused.

Dr. H. S. Gour (Nagpur Division: Non-Muhammadan): Much stronger.

The Honourable Dr. Mian Sir Muhammad Shaif: This one is much stronger.

Dr. H. S. Gour: No, 497 is much stronger.

The Honourable Dr. Mian Sir Muhammad Shafi: At any rate, there is not much distinction to be drawn between these two. Then, I say, Sir, as this prohibition is limited to the most serious class of non-bailable offences and as the offences are in their very nature non-bailable, when once the Magistrate has, upon the record before him, upon the facts before him, upon the evidence or upon the other circumstances established in the case, reason to believe that the offence has been committed, then we as legislators ought to see that the power to release the accused on bail should no longer be exercised after that stage has been reached. To hold otherwise, I submit, would be contrary to all principles of criminal administration.

Now, it was said by my Honourable and learned friend, Sir Henry for whose opinion I entertain the highest respect, that this amounts really to prejudging the case. I submit, it does not. I submit there is no question of prejudging the case. From his own judicial experience, he must have over and over again felt that in the trial of criminal cases a certain stage has been reached, upon the evidence produced before him, when there is reason to think or to believe that the accused person has committed an offence. That does not mean that the case has been prejudged. It only means that a certain amount of evidence has been tendered by the prosecution, or a certain set of facts and circumstances have been established by the prosecution, which have changed the position at the beginning of the trial, viz., the presumption with which the Judge begins in the course of a criminal trial that the accused must be presumed to be innocent and must continue to be presumed to be innocent until his guilt is established, to a somewhat different position, that position being that although the Judge is not yet completely convinced in his mind that the accused is guilty, yet from the facts placed before him, and from the evidence produced by the prosecution, the Judge has reason to believe that the accused has committed the offence. At that stage, I submit his discretionary power of granting bail in these most serious class of non-bailable offences ought to be taken away from him, because the offences are non-bailable and because these offences are the most serious class of non-bailable offences, and the Court trying the accused is neither the Sessions Judge nor the High Court but a Magistrate. I submit that in such cases this discretion ought to be taken away from him, and that is exactly what the clause as we propose contemplates.

Sir, it was said that the sole object of arrest is to prevent a person from running away or from protracting or delaying the trial. As a general rule that is a perfectly legitimate criterion. I admit that that is the main purpose of arrest. But cases might be conceived where other considerations also come in. Let me give but one case, which is not only possible but which we, some of us who have practised at the Bar long enough, can well conceive. A man falls out with two brothers. Bitter enmity subsists between that one man on the one side and the two brothers on the other. He has a fight with these two brothers intending to kill them, but succeeds only in killing one and injuring the other. He is arrested by the police. There is ample evidence against him to prove that he murdered one of the two brothers, and he knows himself that he cannot escape. He knows that he is sure to be convicted and hanged. Well, now, in a case like that, is it not conceivable that he would like to be released on bail in order to go and kill the other brother also before he is hanged? (Laughter.) With all deference, I am afraid that my Honourable friends from the South do not know what stuff people of the north are made of. It is perfectly conceivable that that man may be anxious to be released on bail in order to achieve the very object with which he assaulted the two brothers, which object he failed to achieve in the first instance, and succeeded only in killing the one and simply injuring the other brother; and knowing that he will be hanged, before he is actually hanged, he may take advantage of his release on bail to go and kill the other brother. Sir, with all deference it is hardly right to say that the sole consideration is his presence at the next date of hearing. There may be other considerations also which come in in cases of this kind.

It seems to me that taking all the circumstances into consideration, seeing that admittedly the clause as we propose it is a decided advance, a decided improvement in the existing law, seeing also that the clause as we propose it gives the fullest discretion to the Magistrate in even the most serious class of cases in certain instances to release on bail and prohibits release on bail only when circumstances or facts have been established which have led the Magistrate to believe or have reason to believe that the accused has committed the offence—only in this very narrow circle is he prohibited from releasing the accused on bail in this most serious of all crimes—I submit that the Legislature ought not to go beyond that, that the Legislature should limit in such cases the discretion of the Magistrate in so far as release on bail in non-bailable cases is concerned.

Dr. Nand Lal (West Punjab Non Muhammadan) Sir, the Honourable Mr. Subrahmanyan while advocating the cause of the opposition, told us and we feel surprised for that piece of advice, that the Magistrate has got only to collect the evidence and to send the case up for trial. I differ from him. My knowledge of the criminal law tells me that that is not the case at all. Magistrates and Courts are not to be taken as post offices. Magistrates and Criminal Courts have got to see whether there is any evidence or not even in murder cases. When there is a preliminary inquiry if there is no evidence which can show a prima facie case, then the accused is entitled to a discharge. Therefore, this ground which has been set forth by the Honourable Mr. Subrahmanyan has got no force.

The second ground which he set forth was that the Magistrates are cultured people and highly trained and therefore they will not allow themselves to do injustice and they will not allow themselves to refuse bail. Then in the same breath he asks, how can a Magistrate, how can a Criminal Court, know that the accused will abscond or will not abscond? This argument is inconsistent. In the first place the Magistrate is said to be cultured and very well trained, and then it is said it is impossible for the Magistrate to find out whether the accused will abscond or not. I place his argument before this Honourable House, and I think the House will agree with me that his argument, in itself, is inconsistent. When a Magistrate is a trained and cultured man and the prosecution raises this contention that the accused will probably abscond or avoid the proceedings in the inquiry, the Magistrate will give consideration to it,—an application for bail on behalf of the accused, on the one side, and the reply 4 P.M. on behalf of the prosecution, on the other side; the Magistrate then, after having weighed both the contentions, will come to some conclusion. Where is the impossibility as to how the Magistrate will be able to find whether the accused will abscond or not? The other contention which has been raised by my learned friend, the Honourable Mr. Subrahmanyan, ~~is~~ what is the profit, what is the gain? Well, the gain is this,—that the accused] will be able to defend himself properly. This is the gain, and that ought to be the object of the administration of justice; this will be the profit that the justice will be done to the accused, and he will not be deprived of that right which is allowed to him. That is the gain. Then the Honourable Mr. Subrahmanayam says that the Magistrate will not allow bail if he comes to this conclusion that the accused will abscond away. Only a few minutes back he said it is extremely difficult for the Magistrate to find out whether the accused will run away or not; and after four minutes he raised this point, that if the accused is allowed bail, then the probability is that he will abscond away. I think there is no consistency in these arguments at all. Why will he run away or abscond away? If he is a man of this type, no surety will come forward; his associates, his friends, his relations would not like to stand as sureties simply because he may leave the precincts of the Court or the District in which he is going to be tried. Then my Honourable friend says, it is better that discretion should be given to the Magistrate and the Magistrate's discretion should not be hampered. If he will read the terms of the amendment, they are, if I rightly follow them, "that the accused, if released on bail, would abscond and attempt to escape justice by avoiding or delaying an inquiry or trial." This is the second condition which has been laid down. What are those two conditions which will guide the Magistrate in allowing or disallowing the bail? They are these; (1) that the character of the offence will be so and so, that is an offence punishable with transportation for life or with death (2) The second condition which has been recommended by this amendment is as already described above if there were grounds to believe that the accused if released on bail, will have the opportunity of tampering with the evidence, which is against him or he is going to delay the inquiry; then in those cases the Magistrate will not allow bail. A very reasonable amendment: it covers all the conditions, and therefore I do not find any force in the opposition. The Honourable Mian Sir Muhammad Shafi told us that in serious cases the bail will be allowed under certain conditions, and the provision which has been recommended by the Select Committee is very much improved. I endorse this view that certainly there has been some improvement in the provisions which have been sent up to us for consideration by the Select Committee, and the Select Committee should be thankful, but there is a room for improvement still and on account of that we are discussing the whole thing. He says that only in case of certain offences;—very limited offences which are punishable with transportation for life or death, we have laid down these strict conditions. Of course it is true but our fear is this that even in regard to these cases, if some accused, in some cases, are not allowed bail, there will be room for injustice. The Magistrate should not disallow bail simply because the offence falls within the purview of certain sections which provide a capital punishment or one of transportation for life. That should not be the criterion that, because the punishment provided for the offence is transportation for life or death, therefore, bail should be disallowed. That should not be the measure for accepting or rejecting applications for bail, but something else. What is that something else? It is this as to whether there is a probability that the accused will abscond, whether his real intention is to escape justice or whether his desire is to prolong the inquiry. The mere fact that a complaint is under section 302 or a complaint under a section which provides punishment of transportation for life or death, should not induce the Magistrate or criminal Court to refuse to give bail.

Then the Honourable Mian Sir Muhammad Shafi says that the provision which has been recommended is very lenient. I am sorry I cannot share that view. Words which are of some importance and in favour of this amendment have been lost sight of. They are "if there appear reasonable grounds for believing," not presuming but believing. There could be no belief unless there is some sort of cogent evidence to induce him to believe. Presumption may be based on an inference, but, when you put down the word "believe", then there should be something which may go to show really the accused is guilty. Then, further on, the provision says "that he has been guilty of the offence." So the Magistrate will be prejudging the whole case. But when we go to the provisions of section 254 which has been alluded to by my learned friend—I shall read only the relevant portion—you will find the words "that there is ground for presuming that the accused has committed an offence". Mind that there is a ground for presuming only. Therefore, according to my way of construing the provisions of section 254, I am persuaded to come to this conclusion that the provision under section 497 is stricter, is harder, than that under section 254.

Then my Honourable friend says that there would be great temptation in the way of the accused, who will abscond, to destroy the evidence or to retaliate on other persons, and this argument has been illustrated. The illustration which was given was "that there is a person A who has got animosity with two brothers, and one of them has been murdered by him. Supposing this murderer is allowed bail, when he (murderer) secures his freedom, so far as bail is concerned, he will murder the other brother also. The second brother, who has escaped murder, would be brought before the Magistrate and would say before him 'I say this murder was committed by the accused'. Therefore, the accused will be tempted to do away with the life of the second brother also, in order to destroy the evidence." And therefore bail should not be allowed. My answer to this illustration is that if there is a case like that, then the Magistrate will not allow bail. The Treasury Benches have said, in so many words, that their Magistrates are very competent and one of the advocates of that view has given a very good certificate to them—they are cultured and trained people, he said. They won't allow bail in such cases. (An Honourable Member: "He shall".) There is no word "shall". The word "may" is given. There is no compulsion in such cases; and this is the recommendation which has substantially been made by the amendment. "If the object of the accused who is seeking bail is to avoid justice or prolong the inquiry, then bail will not be allowed." Sir, it is not the attempt nor the desire of this Assembly that the man who has committed an offence and who is guilty may go scot-free. But the serious desire of this Assembly is that he should be given fair trial, that he may not be hampered, that he may not have an excuse for saying "I was not allowed bail; I had no relation, no friend, no associate and therefore I am going to jail though an innocent man, and I have wrongly been declared to be guilty." That is the very sincere desire of this Assembly and this desire is couched in this amendment. Therefore with these few words I support the amendment.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: If I rise to add to what has already been said so admirably by my friends to-day on this question, particularly by Mr. Subrahmanayam, it is because I feel it incumbent on me to do so for one reason only. We have been told that Government feels deeply on this question. Now in arguing matters which are principally of legal procedure, matters such as are involved in the Criminal Procedure Code, I am sure none of us really wish to suggest considerations not strictly relevant to the issue, nor to sway a decision by allusions to the general attitude of Government or its critics. We do not on our side say that those who have criticised the proposals of the Lowndes Committee or the Joint Committee have motives that are not in every way proper and public-spirited; I hope that the Assembly will give us credit also on our side, if we do feel deeply on a question like this, for basing that feeling on grounds which at all events have some solid reason and some propriety behind them.

References tending I think rather to obscure the real issue, have been made to the very large number of people who are unfortunately placed in the lock-up pending trial, not having been admitted to bail, and we have been asked to quote the numbers of such persons who afterwards are acquitted. It must not be forgotten however that any figures we could quote on the subject would refer entirely to a previous state of affairs—that is to say, the state of affairs obtaining under the present law—a law which we have proposed to ameliorate to the best of our ability, and the rigours of which we have attempted to remove. On a balanced survey of the situation in regard to bail I am certain that the Members of the House will readily acquit Government of any desire to press too hardly on the accused, or of any desire to so dispose its judicial arrangements that innocent men should be put to hardship in proving their innocence. If, as is said, Government feels deeply on this question, the feeling is one only, namely, the desire that the real criminals should not escape; and if we have any one motive in the matter, it is to make life possible and safe for the ordinary man—the man whose property is subject to theft, the man whose life is in danger from dacoity, the man whose possessions or whose safety is likely to be invaded by the more violent members of society. And we have a special responsibility in regard to legislation of this nature, because after all the actual administration of justice and law and order lies with the Local Governments; we do feel that we ought not ourselves to assent willingly to any modification of the criminal procedure which would seriously embarrass the authorities responsible for the maintenance of justice. With every desire to be liberal, that consideration must remain paramount in our minds. Now, it is perfectly true that the primary consideration which must govern Courts in giving bail is whether the accused will or will not appear to take his trial. There are however some other considerations which I do not think we ought to lose sight of. It is true, as Sir Muhammad Shafi pointed out, that we cannot pin ourselves down entirely to that one point. Every one with an acquaintance of district life and especially with life in those districts where violent crime is prevalent, knows that there are circumstances in which it is dangerous to allow at liberty, pending trial, a man of exceptionally violent character or influence for evil. One knows that such a man can, by mere terrorism, absolutely suppress evidence, perfectly trustworthy and reliable evidence that would otherwise have been given against him. I quote only one example, not a definite example of the harm done by releasing such man on bail, but an example illustrating what that harm might be. The House will remember a celebrated case in which a number of accused who were not let out on bail were held under trial in the Alipore Jail. Inside that jail itself they murdered an approver. Now, if men will do that when they are not released on bail, it may be left to the imagination what they may sometimes do if they are released on bail. I feel that in the matter of bail we do after all occupy a strong and reasonable position. We have greatly liberalised the existing law; the stages are so well known to the House that I need not weary it by repeating them; but in the first place of course a man who desires bail can always apply to the Sessions Judge or the High Court, on whom no restrictions are placed in respect of its grant. It is surely reasonable that in dealing with other Courts and with the police we should apply some restrictions? Mr. Rangachariar has made great play with what Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith said this morning on the subject of weak or stupid Magistrates. I only want to say that Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith this morning was arguing on a slightly different case, a case with which at present we have no particular concern—I mean, the proposal that in all cases bail could be given without any restriction whatsoever. His remarks consequently hardly apply to the present case, for we now are dealing only with the right to give bail save in the case of persons believed to be guilty of grave misdemeanours. I believe the majority of the House will feel it reasonable, that we should lay down some restrictions in the grant of bail by Magistrates, seeing how serious the results may be to the society at large of allowing dangerous criminals to escape under cover of their bail. The safeguards proposed seem to be the minimum. We have been told that men should be held as absolutely innocent before they are convicted and that it is improper to place upon the Magistrate the obligation of deciding whether there is reasonable ground for believing that the accused person is guilty, before bail is granted to him. But does he really have to decide that? Let us be perfectly frank and honest about it. He only decides that there is a prima facie case. Does any one believe that any one ever has been prejudiced in the course of his trial by the fact that he has been refused bail? (Voices: "Very often.") Let us be clear however as to the exact grounds. Does any here believe that any man has been prejudiced when he came before a Sessions Court or before a Magistrate for trial on one of the graver offences, by the fact that the Magistrate has in refusing bail, prejudiced the case in the sense and to the extent alleged? Do you believe that? If you really believe that, you are in danger of falling into an extraordinarily illogical position—if you follow Mr. Rangachariar; that is to say, you are actually preparing to lay down that the Magistrate shall prejudge the accused not once but twice: he shall not only say, first, that there is a prima facie case against this man, but, second, that he definitely believes that he is going to abscond and that he seeks to delay or evade justice. If there is substance in this objection, the accused is doubly damned in advance.

Then as to the second restriction; discretion to grant bail is full save in cases in which the penalty is death or transportation for life. Much play has been made of the fact that transportation for life applies to a somewhat large number of offences. Well, we are at present engaged in considering legislation regarding the abolition of transportation, and there is no reason whatever why, when we bring that legislation into force, we should not, in so doing, take the opportunity of making the restriction in this section, which now applies to transportation, apply only to the graver offences punishable with long terms of imprisonment. We are not particular in insisting on details if the principle is maintained. But leaving that aspect of the case alone, you are not justified in arguing only on the somewhat milder cases of the defaulting clerk or possibly even the defaulting banker (though in England we know how readily he defaults)—you are not justified in arguing only on these cases, because, after all, you must provide also for your major and really serious cases in which transportation for life is the penalty, and for which when we abolish transportation, a long term of imprisonment must be the penalty. These, I say, you must keep. Now, Sir, those are the very simple requirements that we have laid down, and which up to date the House has accepted; what does Mr. Rangachariar ask us to add? Mark that in all cases of this kind, the law should seek to apply as far as possible a clear and certain test, a test which will allow the man who makes an application to a Magistrate to know the grounds on which he ought to put that application forward and on which he can fairly hope to succeed. The test should be clear enough to provide the Magistrate with some standard or criterion for decision. Well, we ourselves have got these in the provision as drafted by the Select Committee. But Mr. Rangachariar would add a test which is no test at all, and a criterion which is impossible to work. The applicant will have to prove a negative,—that he is not likely to abscond; the Magistrate will have to satisfy himself as to his intentions. How, I don't know; and no one can tell us how to secure the gift of prophecy to Magistrates, but that is the first of Mr. Rangachariar's requirements. It is a problem in psychology—to inquire into the future intentions of a man with whom presumably the Magistrate has no previous personal acquaintance, or it is to be hoped he has none. That is a task which may well baffle the Magistrate—a task, I think, even more difficult than the one which Mr. Azmihotri set us the other day when he asked us to decide the exact second at which police influence died out in a man's mind. Think of the alternatives: "This is a rich man and he has much to lose; so he will not cut his bail. Yet the disgrace of conviction is all the greater for a rich man; he can therefore afford to cut his bail and indemnify his surety. So probably he will abscond." Or should he say I don't know the answer to that puzzle. Or again: "This is a poor man; he has no position to lose and so conviction will not mean so much. So perhaps he will not abscond. Yet he has no property to forfeit, so perhaps he will." On the whole it looks to me as if the case is rather weighted against the poor man; we have heard so much about the respectable man who will not abscond, that it looks as if Mr. Rangachariar's intention is to favour the rich man; if so, I can only say that we ought not to make an alteration in our law which should weight the case against the poor man. But, as I say, his new provision provides no criterion and no test at all, for it involves a Magistrate in a speculation into the man's future intentions, a speculation of the most difficult nature, for neither the antecedents nor the outward circumstances of the accused can help the Court to probe into the attitude of his mind in regard to future action. The invariable result, let me point out to the Assembly, will be that, if an application of this kind is refused, then there will be a further application to the revisionary Court, and the speculation as to the future intentions of the accused will be canvassed again and in an equally obscure atmosphere of guess work and uncertainty. But Mr. Rangachariar does not end there. We thought, when we first discussed this question, that all that we were required to do was to make sure that the man turns up to stand his trial. He adds, at the end of his proviso, certain mysterious words which I frankly confess have baffled me so far. He adds: "and attempt to escape justice by avoiding or delaying an inquiry or trial." Now, it will be remarked that he thereby lays on the Magistrate the necessity of investigating a double condition, both as to the intention of absconding and his ultimate reasons for doing so.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: That is the language of the Calcutta High Court, if I may say so.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: That may be so, but that is a very different thing from putting the prescription into law. The High Courts, after all, are not the sole repositories of wisdom, when it comes to legislation, great as is their position when it comes to interpreting law. I ask anybody here, looking at that section, to place himself in the position of a Magistrate who has to decide the two things, first, whether the accused if given bail is likely to abscond, and secondly, whether his motive in absconding is only to avoid justice by avoiding or delaying an inquiry or trial (for he might have many other and even more undesirable motives); he will indeed feel that he has set the Magistrate a baffling task. But let me conclude. We have liberalised our law already. Now, legislation of this kind must always be progressive. We have taken one great leap, which I think will be viewed by some people with misgiving. Is it reasonable to ask us, and to ask the Local Government who are responsible for the administration of justice and law and order, to go even further at one operation? Again, is it proper to place on the Magistrates the extraordinarily difficult task of deciding on the intentions of the accused, with all the knowledge that if he decides the conundrum in the wrong way he may make it possible for real criminals to escape from justice by the simple process of evading their bail? I say it is not reasonable to ask us to go these lengths after we have gone so far already in the liberalisation of the law.

Rai Bahadur S. N. Singh: I move, Sir, that the question be now put.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"In clause 132 (1) after the words 'for life' insert the following: 'and that the accused if released on bail would abscond and attempt to escape justice by avoiding or delaying an inquiry or trial.'"

The question I have to put is that that amendment be made.

The motion was negatived.

Dr. H. S. Gour: Sir, the amendment I have to move is as follows:

"In sub-clause (1) of clause 132 after the words and figures 'sub-section (1)' insert the words 'without special cause' after the words 'so released'."

The object of my amendment is to provide for the release of a person accused of an offence punishable with death or transportation for life for a special cause. Honourable Members will see that the Select Committee themselves recognise this principle in the proviso which they have added to the section, for they have provided that in all cases punishable with death or transportation for life, any person under the age of 16 or any woman or any sick or infirm person may be released on bail. The only difference between me and the Government is this. They have specified four cases of special cause when a person may be released on bail. I want them to make this clause more elastic to provide for contingencies which may occur in practice. I will give the Honourable Members a simple illustration of the limitations which are apparent on this proviso. It has been provided that the Court may direct that any person under the age of 16 may be so released. If the inquiry shows that the accused is just 16 or one day more than 16, the Magistrate will have to say, "That one day makes all the difference in your case, between your enlargement on bail and incarceration in prison. Surely, Government never intended that the proviso should work an injustice as it would in the case I have quoted. Take another illustration. It has been recognised, and rightly recognised, by the Select Committee that a person who is sick or infirm is entitled to apply for his release on bail even in non-bailable cases punishable with death or transportation for life. But now suppose, though the person himself is neither sick nor infirm, his wife or his only child is dangerously ill, let us assume, from bubonic plague, and his withdrawal from his wife or child means a probable, if not certain, death of his relation. Is not that a special cause which would justify the Court in releasing the accused on bail? Then other cases might be conceived where in the circumstances of the case and for special cause the Magistrate should exercise his power of releasing the accused on bail. You have yourselves recognised the principle that in non-bailable cases of the character described here the accused may be released on bail for special cause. The only difference is that your enumeration of "special cause" is incomplete and I want to complete it by adding a general clause, namely, "special cause" in the main section, to enlarge its scope. I do not think, if the Government are in a reasonable attitude—(A Voice: "No") some Members here say they are not—I believe they are in a reasonable attitude.—I have not the slightest doubt that they will see that my amendment really supplements the proviso and is a salutary improvement which would meet unforeseen and probable contingencies, and that if my amendment is not passed it will make the proviso inelastic and rigid and shut out from its beneficent provisions some cases, which I have said, are easily conceivable and which I assert are deserving of equal commiseration with those enumerated in the proviso. Sir, I move my amendment.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Reasonably or unreasonably, I am afraid I must oppose my Honourable friend's amendment, chiefly on the ground of what I may call its hopeless vagueness. The words are "without special cause". The Courts will ask themselves, "What had the Legislature in its mind when it used these words?" The Court will say, "It is perfectly true that the Legislature has put in a proviso regarding a minor or a woman or a sick or infirm person. Now this 'special cause' that the Legislature has introduced into section 497(1) must be something quite different, something on different lines from that. What the cause is going to be, the Magistrate I think will find some difficulty to decide. Dr. Gour has suggested that there are innumerable special cases not covered by the proviso, but, Sir, he has only mentioned one, and that is the case of the accused husband with a wife who is dangerously sick. Sir, I do not see that we can provide for that case. The accused person, the person we are dealing with, is one who is accused of an offence punishable with transportation for life or death, and the Court, Sir, has reason to believe that the person is guilty of that serious offence. Sir, if that person had a sick wife, I think he should have borne that in mind beforehand; the law cannot take any account of those considerations. If the man could commit such a serious crime, or do an act which led the Court to believe that he had committed such a serious crime, then, with his wife ill, Sir, is there any reason why the Court should release him on bail? The chief objection, however, to my friend's amendment is that it is hopelessly vague; it gives the Court no indication whatever of the special causes which are to enable it to allow an accused person out on bail. If there are special causes, Sir, if the Magistrate has gone wrong and refused bail in a case in which he should have given bail, my Honourable friend will remember that there is the Sessions Court next door and the High Court possibly not very far away, and it is always possible in every case, whatever the crime may be, and whatever the circumstances may be, to go to those Courts, the Sessions Court and the High Court, and to ask for bail there.

Mr. President: The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, in clause 132, I am not moving all the amendments standing in my name in the Amendment No. 359 (a) and (b), but I beg your permission to move only clause (b), namely, omit sub-clause (iii). Sir, sub-clause (iii) reads: "the following sub-section shall be inserted after sub-section (2), namely: "An officer or a Court releasing any person on bail under sub-section (1) or sub-section (2) shall record in writing his or its reasons for so doing." Sir, it is much regretted—and as has been observed also by other speakers previous to me, I am constrained to observe that the attitude of the Government on the matter of bail has been unsatisfactory and undesirable.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: I presume the Honourable Member means the attitude of the House.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Oh, no. I mean the attitude of the Government in not accepting some reasonable amendments put forward by us—I need not attribute it to the House, because, to-day, I think, more than half belong to the Government Benches.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: No, no.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, we heard some very lucid and weighty arguments advanced by the Honourable Sir Henry Stanyon and the Honourable Mr. Rangachariar in support of further liberalizing the provisions under section 497, but they have all been in vain. And under section 497 we now find that one clog after another has been put to fetter the discretion of the Magistrate. I do not know the reason for not including in this section any clause to the effect that the Magistrate should also give reasons for refusing or for not granting bail but, on the contrary, I find a provision made that he should assign, and write out his reasons, for granting bail. What will be the effect? The Magistrates, of whom, it has been said for the first time to-day, from the Government Benches that some are stupid, will take it as a limitation on their discretion and would be afraid of granting bail to an accused person even where he deserves it under section 497. Therefore, I propose that either there should also be a provision for requiring the Magistrate in cases of refusal to write out his reasons for refusing to grant bail or, if that provision is not to be made in this section 497, then it is much better that even this sub-clause (iii) be dropped.

Sir, I beg to move that sub-clause (iii) of clause 132 be omitted.

The motion was negatived.

Bao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Before sub-clause (iv) is taken into consideration, I have got an amendment which has been drafted by the Legislative Department which will probably come in this place. It reads as follows:

"That in clause 132:

(a) in sub-clause (iii), for the word 'sub-section' the word 'sub-sections' be substituted and after the proposed new sub-section (3) the following sub-section be added, namely:

'(4) If, at any time after the conclusion of the trial of a person accused of a non-bailable offence and before judgment is delivered, the Court is of opinion that there are reasonable grounds for believing that the accused is not guilty of any such offence, it shall release the accused, if he is in custody, on the execution by him of a bond without sureties for his appearance to hear judgment delivered."

(b) In sub-clause (iv) the proposed new sub-section (4) be re numbered (5) '."

The reason for this amendment is this. As Honourable Members are aware, at the conclusion of a trial in an original Court, often times judgment is not ready for delivery at once, but the Court has come to the conclusion, after taking the verdict of the assessors or the jury in a Sessions trial, or the Magistrate has made up his mind, that the accused is not guilty and, therefore, proposes to acquit him. As sections 366 and 367 stand, a doubt has been expressed whether really the accused could be set at liberty before judgment is actually pronounced. In fact, an unfortunate client of mine, was acquitted like this and judgment was delivered a week later. The complainant took the matter up to the High Court and a Full Bench had to sit to consider the question whether the whole trial was not vitiated by such a procedure. In order to avoid such things, this provision is necessary. Therefore, Sir, I move the amendment as it stands.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, I move that:

"In clause 132 after sub-section (4) the sub-section that has just been added—the following sub-section shall be inserted, namely:

'The District Magistrate may release on bail any person accused of an offence in any case; and may revise an order of a Subordinate Magistrate refusing to grant bail in any case.'

Sir, at present as the law stands it is the High Court and the Sessions Judge that have been authorised to release persons on bail in any case or to revise the order of a Magistrate under section 498. But by this amendment I wish to provide that the District Magistrate may also be authorised to grant bail in any case and to revise the order of other Magistrates. I need not remind the House that there are districts where the Magistrates are distributed in the interior far away from the district headquarters and further away from the Sessions Court. For instance the tahsildars or the Honorary Magistrates in the mofussil. If the court of the Honorary Magistrate, or of the Tahsildars or of the Magistrates in the mofussil were to refuse bail to an accused person, then it works very hard for the accused or his friends who have to go up for bail a long distance to the Sessions Courts or a longer distance to the High Courts which are almost inaccessible to many such accused owing to the distance and owing to their poverty. In such cases it will not be undesirable but is an absolute necessity to authorise the District Magistrates to allow granting of bail. Such difficulties have arisen before and the Bombay High Court has held that the District Magistrate could not grant bail in a case where the subordinate Magistrate had declined to grant bail to an accused. So in order to avoid the trouble and inconvenience especially to the poor accused, it is necessary that this provision should be incorporated in this Bill. Therefore, Sir, I move this amendment.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Sir, I would merely point out to the House that under the law, in the first place the police officer, if it is a case in which the police have effected an arrest, can release on bail. Then, Sir, the Court itself before which the accused is produced can release the man on bail; and if up to this time the accused has not been successful he can go to the Sessions Court; and thereafter, Sir, he can go to the High Court. There are four separate stages at which the accused will be able to get bail and I would suggest to the House that it is quite unnecessary that we should provide a further fifth opportunity for enabling the accused to obtain bail and be released.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, I move that:

"In clause 132 after sub-section (4) the following sub-section shall be inserted, namely:

'For an offence triable in a summary way any person accused of a non-bailable offence shall, during the pendency of trial, be released on bail by any Judge or Magistrate'."

Sir, it will appear that I have omitted certain words in the amendment of which I gave notice and I wish to have your permission to move the amendment in the form in which I have just read. By this amendment I wish to provide that in petty cases or in summary trials the accused should be released on bail. If Honourable Members will refer to section 260 which provides for trials in a summary way they will find that there are many non-bailable offences that could be tried in a summary way where they are of a petty or of a trifling nature. Therefore, I wish to provide that in such cases which are triable in a summary way the accused should always be released on bail. It often happens, Sir, just as was pointed out by Sir Henry Stanyon, that a very well-to-do man or a man of exceptionally good character is accused of a non-bailable offence but of a very trifling character. In that case to keep the accused under lock-up will not be proper and will not meet the ends of justice. In such cases even if they end in conviction the accused would at the most be fined or released on probation under section 562, and so it is undesirable to keep him in the lock-up during the pendency of the trial. I know a case where a son of a big landlord happened to have in his possession a pair of shoes, old and worthless; he was channned by the police and put up on trial under section 379 or 414, I am not sure which, and when an application was made before the Magistrate, he declined to release him on bail and the accused had to approach a higher authority who granted him bail. So in such cases it is hard to keep them in the lock-up like this. In another case a railway ticket inspector was put on trial for having been in wrongful possession of a pair of wooden pegs and he was not released on bail even though the value of the pegs was only four annas. Such cases are very hard for the accused and therefore, Sir, I suggest that it may not be left to the discretion of the Magistrate in such cases to grant bail, but that in such petty cases the accused should as of right be entitled to be released on bail. With these words I beg to move my amendment.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Sir, the amendment which has been moved will

5 P.M. take away in these cases the discretion from the Courts; that is to say, in all these cases it will be compulsory upon the Courts to release a person on bail. I would merely invite the attention of the House to the fact that section 457, for example, is included in section 260. Such an offence would of course not in actual practice be tried in a summary way, but an offence under that section is in the words of the amendment "triable in a summary way," so that your burglar, the man who has committed house-breaking by night with intention to commit theft, must necessarily by this amendment be released on bail.

The motion was negatived.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Sir, mine is not an amendment to give a fifth or further opportunity to the accused person to be enlarged on bail. My amendment is that the one opportunity he had may not be taken away from him. Here the clause provides that "a High Court or Court of Session, and in the case of a person released by itself, any other Court may cause any person who has been released under this section to be arrested and may commit him to custody." This gives the power to these authorities to cancel a bail already given, and that, Sir, without any limitation, without any reason, the Court can do so. Now I provide that it can only do so if it is satisfied that the accused is attempting to abscond or escape justice. There must be some reason on which a bail once granted should be revoked. I heard of a case where a Magistrate ordered the release on bail and then directly a police Inspector turned up and when the accused had gone about 20 or 30 yards, the police Inspector came up and said to the Magistrate "Why did you release him on bail? He made a noise about it, and then the Magistrate at once cancelled the bail. It ought not to be left to the free will and pleasure of these authorities to cancel the bail once granted. It should only be revoked on proper cause. I have suggested a proper cause, and I submit, Sir, that can be the only proper cause for which a bail should be cancelled. I therefore, Sir, move the amendment, and I hope and trust the Government will not see its way to oppose it. I see a very ominous shake from my Honourable friend Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith that my amendment is doomed. However, I am satisfied with having tried my best in this direction. I move my amendment which runs as under:

"In clause 132 (ir) in proposed sub-section (4) after the word 'may' and before the word 'commit' insert the words 'on being satisfied that the accused is attempting to abscond or escape justice'."

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Sir, I would ask the Honourable Mover of this amendment what is going to happen when the High Court or the Court of Session has caused a person to be arrested and then it is not satisfied that the accused is attempting to abscond or evade justice? As a matter of fact, Sir, Mr. Rangachariar probably put his words into the wrong place of the section.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Put them in the right place then.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: As it stands, it will mean this, that the High Court has a person brought before it in custody, and then it has to be satisfied that the person is trying to abscond even before he is committed to custody.

I would suggest to Mr. Rangachariar that once a man is in custody before the High Court, it is rather difficult for the High Court to say to itself: This man is attempting to abscond. He has no chance of absconding. But, Sir, in any case how is the Court going to be satisfied that the man is attempting to abscond? I would suggest to the House that there is no question of attempting to abscond at all. If a man is going to abscond, he absconds. There is no question of attempting, there is no half-way house between them. The man is gone. And therefore, Sir, I think this amendment will not help the accused, it will not help the Court, and that we should throw it out.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. President: The question is that clause 132, as amended, stand part of the Bill.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, before you put that question, may I point out that we adjourned the consideration of some provisions under clause 11 to be dealt with in the Chapter on bail. So I think that will have to be considered before the question is put in this connection, and I move that the consideration of this section 132 be postponed.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Sir, I would suggest that we have already postponed the consideration of this matter for Mr Agnihotri's benefit for some weeks and I assumed that Mr. Agnihotri would now be prepared to come forward with an amendment on the bail sections which would meet his point with regard to arrest without warrant. I have received no notice of an amendment, Sir, from Mr. Agnihotri.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Unfortunately, it only struck me just now.

Clause 132, as amended, was added to the Bill.

Clauses 133, 134 and 135 were added to the Bill.

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu: Sir, I propose:

"In clause 136 in proposed section 514 A, omit the words 'under this Code'."

I believe, Sir, the words "under this Code" here are meant to qualify the words "becomes insolvent" and not the word "dies" also. But I have not been able to understand, Sir, what the authors of this section mean by a person becoming insolvent under this Code. I have not been able to discover any provisions in the Criminal Procedure Code regarding insolvency. Therefore, I propose, Sir, that the words "under this Code" be omitted.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Sir, I admit that my Honourable friend, Mr. Pantulu, has discovered a printing mistake in the Bill. Sir, it is true that people do not become insolvent or die under the Code. I think, however, that we must retain the words "under this Code" and I would therefore propose the following amendment in lieu of that which has been moved by my Honourable friend:

"That in clause 136 in proposed new section 514-A, for the words 'becomes under this Code' the words 'under this Code becomes' be substituted."

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu: I agree.

Mr. President: Has the Honourable Member leave to withdraw his amendment?

Mr. Pantulu's amendment was, by leave of the Assembly, withdrawn.

Mr. President: Further amendment moved:

"That in clause 136, in proposed new section 514-A, for the words 'becomes under this Code' the words 'under this Code becomes' be substituted."

The question I have to put is that that amendment be made.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. Harchandrai Vishindas: May I suggest, Sir, that you will be pleased to have the House adjourned as we have a Conference to attend?

Mr. President: I will consider that presently.

Clause 136, as amended, was added to the Bill.

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu: Sir, I move only the second part of my amendment:

"In clause 137, in proposed section 516-A, for the words 'such evidence as it thinks necessary' substitute the words 'its reasons'."

The section runs:

"When any property regarding which any offence appears to have been committed, or which appears to have been used for the commission of any offence, is produced before any Criminal Court during any inquiry or trial, the Court may make such order as it thinks fit for the proper custody of such property pending the conclusion of the inquiry or trial, and, if the property is subject to speedy or natural decay, may, after recording such evidence as it thinks necessary, order it to be sold or otherwise disposed of."

I do not think that anything is gained by requiring the court to record any evidence. I think that what is necessary is to require the Court to record its reasons for ordering the property to be disposed of. The Court might record any evidence that it thinks necessary. It will make some sort of inquiry before passing the order, and it is only necessary to require the Court in such cases to record its reasons for ordering the property to be disposed of. With these words, Sir, I move my amendment.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"In clause 137 in proposed section 516 A, for the words 'such evidence as it thinks necessary' substitute the words 'its reasons'."

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Sir, I would merely point out to the House that the Bill as it stands does not require that evidence shall be recorded. The evidence which it might be desirable to record will be evidence identifying the property and so on. It is certainly most desirable in such cases to identify the property by evidence before you make an order for the disposal of property pending trial. For these reasons, Sir, I oppose the amendment.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. President: The question is that clause 137 stand part of the Bill.
The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: The question is that clause 138 stand part of the Bill.
The motion was adopted.

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu: I propose, Sir, that in clause 139, sub-clause (ii), the words "or at any time within one month from the date of the conviction" be omitted.

This clause, Sir, refers to section 522. The section as it is runs as follows:

"Whenever a person is convicted of an offence attended by criminal force, and it appears to the Court that, by such force, any person has been dispossessed of any immoveable property, the Court may, if it thinks fit, order such person to be restored to the possession of the same."

The Bill proposes to amend this by inserting:

"when convicting such person or at any time within one month from the date of the conviction."

Well, this section gives power to a Magistrate when convicting a person of an offence attended with criminal force to make an order, if any person is found to have been dispossessed of any property by the commission of that offence, restoring the property to the person. The section as it stands does not fix any limit of time within which that order should be passed. But the Bill provides that such order should be passed either at the time when the accused person is convicted or within a month after that. I propose that the words giving power for the order to be passed within a month after the conviction be omitted. For, I do not see why any time is necessary for a Court to pass an order restoring possession of property to the person who has been dispossessed. All the evidence that is required to enable him to come to a decision on that point has already been recorded in the course of the trial of that offence, and the very fact that the Magistrate has found the man guilty of that offence ought to be sufficient to enable the Court to come to a decision as to whether any person has been forcibly dispossessed of property or not. I do not think that the section contemplates any inquiry subsequent to the disposal of the original case. All the evidence that is necessary to enable the Magistrate to form a judgment in the matter has already been adduced and recorded. That being so, I do not see why any time should be given to the Magistrate to make this order, especially as no such time is given in the present Code. I, therefore, propose the omission of the words as mentioned in my amendment.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Sir, my Honourable friend suggests that section 522 of the Code at present, if I have understood him aright, requires that possession shall be given simultaneously with the conviction. I do not know if I have understood him aright, but that is what I understood my Honourable friend to say.

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu: It leaves the question open. There is no time limit fixed.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: The present clause is to some extent doubtful. There was an old ruling reported in 4 Calcutta Weekly Notes which was to the effect that the order must be simultaneous with the conviction but that has been very frequently dissented from since and there is at any rate one recorded case in which possession was restored after 22 months. Now, Sir, in the Bill of 1914 we proposed to enable such an order to be passed within six months after the conviction. The Lowndes Committee thought it was desirable to reduce that period and they said, they accepted the amendment but they substituted a period of one month for six months from the date of conviction as the time during which an application for restoration must be made, because they said "We do not think that an order of restoration need be made simultaneously with the conviction, but we think that any application for such an order should be made promptly and that one month is sufficient time to allow for this purpose." Surely, Sir, the Bill is really reasonable in this respect. The complainant may imagine that as soon as the conviction has been secured in a criminal case, he will immediately secure possession of the immovable property. But then, if he finds that he does not get the property back, why should he not be able to apply promptly and get an order from the Criminal Court that he should be replaced in possession? For these reasons, Sir, I oppose the amendment.

The amendment was negatived.

Mr. President: The question is that clauses 139 and 140 stand part of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. B. N. Misra (Orissa Division: Non-Muhammadian): Sir, may I submit, before I move my amendment, that this is a very important clause and besides my amendment there are six other amendments which will take a very long time. Honourable Members are anxious to attend a conference as has been represented by Mr. Harchandrai Vishindas. So, we will be obliged if you will kindly adjourn the business now.

Mr. President: We have been considering this Bill now for a very considerable period; and in view of the state of public business I am afraid I must proceed with it a little further to-night.

Mr. B. N. Misra: My amendment* relates to clause 141 which relates to section 526 of the Criminal Procedure Code. This section deals with application for transfer of cases from Magistrate's Courts or appeals from Sessions Judges. Whenever it appears that they cannot get a fair and impartial inquiry in the lower court, under this section they are to move the High Court for a transfer of their case. My amendment relates . . .

Mr. President: Which amendment is the Honourable Member moving? Is he moving both together?

Mr. B. N. Misra: Practically the two parts are connected.

Mr. President: The discussion ought really to turn on the omission of sub-clause (ii). The Honourable Member will move the omission of sub-clause (ii) first. We will go to the other part of the amendment later on.

Mr. B. N. Misra: Side by side, I shall have also to speak about the other. My arguments for both are practically of the same nature. My amendment relates to section 526, clause (5). Sir, clause 5 provides that when an accused person makes an application under this section, the High Court may ask him to execute a bond with or without sureties on condition that, if convicted, he will pay the costs of the prosecution. That was the old section. The present section provides the condition that he will, if convicted, pay any amount which the High Court has power under this section to award by way of costs to the person opposing the application; and the other portion, clause (2), is a new one, entirely a new one; it says that whenever any application for the exercise of the power conferred by this section is dismissed, the High Court may, if it is of opinion that the application was frivolous or vexatious, order the applicant to pay, by way of costs, to any person who has opposed the application, any expenses reasonably incurred by such person in consequence of the application. This is entirely new. Sir, under the original provision, when an order was made by the High Court that, on conviction of a certain person, he will be liable to pay the costs of the prosecutor, it was a case which was never pressed because when the accused was convicted, really the anger of the prosecution ceased, and the man was also in jail;—no doubt it could compel the accused to pay the costs of the prosecution. Then there was no provision made for the costs incurred in the High Court. Really, the cost that were then intended, were the costs of the prosecution in the lower Court; in such cases generally the costs are a very small amount, even if the costs were paid, they were not such a heavy amount and they did not really cause such hardship to the accused. The old Code never made it compulsory for payment of costs by both the parties. It was only in cases of conviction that the accused was asked to pay the costs,—if he was convicted. In cases under 526, it is the prosecution also who can apply for a transfer. There was no provision made that even if the prosecution or the complainant or the Crown made the application, they were liable to pay any costs. But the amendment as it now stands makes any applicant liable to pay to the other party opposing the application. In the present case it is not only the accused that has to pay the costs of the prosecution, but, if the prosecution applied, and lost his application, he has to pay the costs of the accused. I submit this is really a hardship. It does not make provision, for the payment of costs when the application is granted. When an application is granted, it is obvious that on account of the misconduct or on account of the misbehaviour of the Magistrate the party did not expect to get a fair trial or fair justice. It is obvious, that is why he was driven to go to the High Court. In such a case when the application is granted, I think in fairness the Government ought to provide that the Magistrate on whose account the party came before the High Court ought to pay the costs. I think Government will not do such a thing against the Magistrate whose conduct drove the party to go before the High Court. I submit, Sir, really it is the conduct of the Magistrate that drives a party to go to the High Court. Parties ordinarily do not go to High Court unless they really apprehend injustice—I mean, they apprehend an unfair trial. They apprehend that they cannot get justice. Sir, section 526 says that whenever it is made to appear to the High Court that a fair and impartial inquiry or trial cannot be had in any Criminal Court subordinate thereto, or that some question of law of unusual difficulty is likely to arise—there are also other matters such as a view of the place is necessary and so forth,—or that such an order is expedient for the ends of justice or is required by any provision of this Code—it may make an order to transfer a case from one court to another court. So it is not, simply because, a party apprehends that he cannot get justice in the lower Court but there are many other grounds for which a party can make an application before the High Court. It is not because the accused says that he has not committed a crime or that he is innocent that a case comes before the High Court but for several other reasons. It may be that the accused wants that the trial should not take place before the particular court from whom he suspects that he cannot get fair justice. It is mainly on this ground that a party comes before the High Court. If the High Court refuses the application, it will under the new provision allow the costs reasonably incurred by the party opposing the application. The Criminal Procedure Code contemplated costs to be awarded under certain sections. We know that under section 148 costs are to be awarded by a Magistrate when there is a dispute about immoveable property, and we see also under the same Code costs are allowed under section 488 in maintenance cases. The only section that contemplates costs to be paid to the prosecution is section 545 and under that section the costs that are allowed are only the costs incurred by the prosecution, such as the costs for the Court fees and other things. There are several rulings, Sir, 4 Bombay and 24 Law Reporter Madras L. L. R. If compensation is to be paid to the prosecution, it has to be paid out of the fine and not under a separate sentence.

(At this stage Sir Campbell Rhodes took the Chair which was vacated by Mr. President.)

The particular case, 24 Madras, which I wish to place before the House is this: "The accused was convicted of having caused hurt and fined Rs. 15 and was also ordered to pay compensation of Rs. 12-4, or Rs. 2-4 being Court fees paid by the complainant and Rs. 10 being damages for other expenses incurred. Held that the levy of Court fees of Rs. 2-4 was warranted by section 31 of the Court-fees Act, VIII of 1870, as the duty of the Court to award Court and process fees in addition to the fine is imperative. But under this section the Court has the discretion to award the expenses of the prosecution, which must be taken to exclude those expenses in regard to which the Court has no discretion. Expenses other than Court fees incurred in the prosecution can only be awarded to the complainant out of the fine levied from the accused and cannot be levied from the accused in addition to the fine."

In a case like this, when a man comes before the High Court, the party who opposes the application is to be paid costs. This is an additional cost now being put under the present amendment. We know, Sir, the heavy costs that are incurred in applications before the High Court. Sometimes, if you engage counsels like Mr. Norton or Mr. Hassan Inān, they demand Rs. 1,000 per day. In such cases, if a party opposing an application has engaged such a counsel and paid heavy fees, perhaps the Court may say that these heavy fees were reasonably incurred. It will be really preventing people from making any application before the High Court or from going to the High Court. Sir, when a man comes to the High Court, practically he is under the tyranny of the Magistrate. That is why he comes and now you put another pressure on him in the High Court that he will have to pay so much. Practically he will never dare come before the High Court and make an application for transfer of a case. This will really result in serious injustice, and it will encourage such Magistrates as cannot exercise their discretion properly to do any thing they like. There is grave danger that a party cannot have a fair trial. This will be putting a premium on the high-handedness of Magistrates because the applicants cannot go before the High Court. Sir, I notice that the Honourable Members have left the Chamber. I have no hopes about my amendment being carried. I still say that this is really a very hard provision for one party to pay all the money to the other party for opposing the application in the High Court. I do not know why this provision, which is entirely a new one, has been introduced in this Bill for the first time.

Sir, the second part of my amendment is about frivolous and vexatious applications. Of course it will be something for the lower Court, which is trying the case, to find out and say if the case is frivolous or vexatious. How can the Honourable the High Court find out if a certain application is frivolous or vexatious? The procedure laid down under this section is that a party making an application will have to verify it by an affidavit. The High Court has no opportunity of knowing whether an affidavit is frivolous or vexatious unless there is an inquiry or trial. It is not contemplated that the High Court should find out whether the allegations made in the affidavit are true or false. In such a case, how can the Honourable Judges of the High Court find out that the application is frivolous or vexatious. I submit, Sir, it will be simply shutting out the doors to a party coming before the High Court asking for a transfer, which is really a very wholesome procedure and which very often checks the vagaries of the lower Courts. Sir, the High Court Judges cannot have sufficient materials to adjudge whether an application is frivolous or vexatious. I do not think the Honourable Members of the Government Bench do really wish—that the High Court should adjudge an application to be frivolous or vexatious without any materials before them. In the case of enhancement of punishment at least there is some material before the High Court. In the present case what material is here before their Lordships? Simply there is an affidavit, and they say "we believe it or not;" there is no other material. How can they call it frivolous or vexatious, or ask the party to pay the expenses reasonably incurred by such a person in consequence of the application? I submit that on both grounds it is unjust to introduce the provision that costs should be paid in the High Court by an applicant who loses. Sir, with these few words I commend my amendment to the House.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Sir, I think it will only be necessary to say a very few words with reference to this amendment. The proposal in the Bill was introduced because of the manner in which section 520 is used, or rather abused, at present. As a matter of fact when the Lowndes Committee noted upon this point they said they were satisfied that advantage is frequently taken of the section to obtain an adjournment which would otherwise be refused without the least intimation of making any application to the High Court. "It is reported to us for instance that in the Dacca Division during the past three years adjournments were obtained in not less than 125 cases in which no attempt was made to move the High Court." Well, Sir, that is the reason why such a provision has been introduced. Now, look at the provision. The application must be frivolous and vexatious. This must be found by the High Court and not on an affidavit as suggested by my Honourable friend, but when the application is finally dismissed. You have then got the whole of the trial record before the Court. It is when the final order is made that this order is passed. And when the High Court finds that the application was frivolous or vexatious the clause only provides that it may direct that the expenses reasonably incurred by the person opposing the application shall be paid.

The amendment to omit sub-clause (b) of clause 141 was negatived.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Sir, I understand my Honourable friend has also moved the first part of his amendment—in fact most of his speech was directed towards it. The first amendment having been defeated this amendment followed as a matter of course because sub-section (5) is merely consequential throughout sub-section (6A). It has, however, been brought to notice that there is a mistake in sub-section (5), a consequential amendment which should have been made and which the Joint Committee overlooked. Sub-section (6A) lays down that in every case where the High Court is of opinion that the application was frivolous or vexatious it should have power to award costs to any person who has opposed the application. Sub-section (5) enables these costs to be paid in cases where the accused is convicted. But, Sir, as I said, sub-section (6A) enables these costs to be awarded in every case whether the accused is convicted or not; the criterion simply is that the application was frivolous or vexatious. Further these words are out of place and should be amended to bring them into line with (6A) which the House has now approved. I would therefore with the indulgence of the House move:

"That in clause 141 in sub-clause (b) after the figure (5) the following be inserted, namely, 'for the word 'convicted' the words 'so ordered' be substituted and.'"

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu: I propose, Sir, that in clause 141, sub-clause (iii) in proposed sub-section (8) after the word 'inquiry' the words "prior to the accused entering on his defence," be inserted. This section relates to applications made to the High Court for transfer of cases. The existing law is contained in sub-section (8) of section 526. It runs as follows:

"If, in any criminal case or appeal, before the commencement of the hearing, the Public Prosecutor, the complainant or the accused notifies to the Court before which the case or appeal is pending, his intention to make an application under this section in respect of the case, the Court shall exercise powers of postponement or adjournment given by section 344 in such a manner as will afford a reasonable time for the application being made and an order being made thereon, before the accused is called on for his defence, or, in the case of an appeal, before the hearing of the appeal."

Well, the Bill modifies this provision, and the modified section runs thus:

"If in the course of any trial or inquiry or before the commencement or hearing of any appeal, the Public Prosecutor, the complainant or the accused notifies to the Court before which the case or appeal is pending his intention to make an application under this section in respect of such case or appeal, the Court shall adjourn the case or postpone the appeal for such a period as will afford a reasonable time for the application to be made and an order to be obtained thereon."

It will be seen that so far as trials and inquiries are concerned, the amendment proposed in the Bill makes it compulsory on the Court to adjourn the case on application being made therefor at any stage of the inquiry or trial.

(At this stage Mr. President resumed the Chair.)

Whereas under the existing law, such an application can be entertained,-- the Court is bound to entertain such an application if made before the commencement of the hearing. The proposed section makes it compulsory for the Court to adjourn whenever the applications may be made during the trial or inquiry so far as trials and inquiries are concerned. My proposal is that such an application should be entertained, and the Court should be bound to grant an adjournment only when such an application is made before an accused person is put on his defence or before he is charged. I quite conceive that applications on this behalf may be made by the prosecution as well as by the accused, but in either case, I suppose the main ground on which the application for a transfer from a court will be made to the High Court will be that justice and impartial trial cannot be expected from that particular Court. I think the complainant or the accused ought to be able to form a judgment as to the impartiality of the Judge by the time the prosecution is concluded and the accused is put on his trial. From the practical point of view, Sir, the procedure that is prescribed in the new section is likely to result in much delay in the trial of cases. A very frequent sort of cases which arise is this. A charge has been framed against the accused, and the defence evidence has been recorded and the Magistrate adjourns the case for delivering judgment. Supposing at that time the Magistrate is transferred and is waiting to be relieved by his successor. He has heard the case completely and he has only to write the judgment. And at that time, if the accused thinks that the case has gone against him and that he is likely to be convicted, his only chance lies in getting an adjournment of the case in the hope that this Magistrate or Judge may be transferred and, when the new Judge or Magistrate comes, he may have a fresh trial. This is a very frequent trick that is adopted by accused persons to apply for an adjournment to enable him to apply for a transfer after the case has been practically closed. In such cases, it will be very undesirable that the Court should be bound to grant an adjournment. Of course, there is nothing to prevent a Court from granting an adjournment, at any time, even as it is. Under the new section also it can grant an adjournment, whenever a person makes an application, whatever be the stage of the trial at which that application is made. In cases such as that I have mentioned, it will result in great delay as the new Magistrate will have to start a retrial of the whole case. I, therefore, Sir, propose that in this section, after the word "inquiry" the words "prior to the accused entering on his defence" be inserted.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Sir, we have no objection to the principle of the Honourable Member's amendment. His proposal is, I understand, in principle to keep the law as it stands at the moment and to keep it as it stood in the Bill as introduced. I would suggest, however, on the subject of drafting, that his words do not come in very well after the word "inquiry" because in an inquiry the accused is not called upon to enter on his defence. Therefore, I would suggest that they be inserted after the word "shall". The present law is that, if an application is made in the case of an inquiry or trial, then the Court shall give an adjournment before the accused enters on his defence so as to enable him to have a reasonable opportunity for making the application. I think it would read better, Sir, if these words "prior to the accused entering on his defence" were inserted not after the word "inquiry" but after the words "the Court shall", and then, Sir, insert the word "shall" before the word "postpone". It will read:

"The Court shall, prior to the accused entering on his defence, adjourn the case or shall postpone the appeal."

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu: Sir, I do not know whether that will be all right, but, since you are agreeing to the principle you can put it as you like best.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Sir, the draftsman suggests that in place of the words proposed to be inserted by Mr. Pantulu the words "before a charge is framed against the accused" might be inserted. It is much the same thing. Of course, the words "entering on his defence" would not apply to an inquiry, but in an inquiry a charge is framed, and therefore the stage of the trial is practically the same, the framing of the charge and calling upon the accused for his defence.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"In the proposed amendment, omit the words 'prior to the accused entering on his defence' in order to insert the words 'before a charge is framed against the accused'."

Further amendment moved:

"In line (1) of sub-section (8) to substitute the words 'inquiry or trial' for the words 'trial or inquiry'."

The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: Further amendment moved:

"That the words 'before a charge is framed against the accused' be inserted after the word 'trial' in the sub-section as amended."

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu: That will exclude summons cases. The words "after the accused is put on his defence" will be general.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: I would suggest that after all Mr. Pantulu's original amendment would be suitable after what we have already done in the sub-section.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith's amendment was, by leave of the Assembly, withdrawn.

Mr. President: The question is:

"That the words 'prior to the accused entering on his defence' be inserted after the word 'trial' in subsection (8) as amended."

The motion was adopted.

Clauses 141 as amended, 142 and 143 were added to the Bill.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Sir, I beg to move that:

"In clause 143, sub-clause (a), for the words 'in clause (d), the word 'want' the following be substituted, namely:

'the word 'want' where it occurs for the second time'.

I do not think I need present to this House on this very luminous amendment.

The motion was adopted.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Sir, I should like to move the amendment which stands in the name of Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar, namely:

"For sub-clause (a) of clause 144 the following be substituted:

'(i) Clause (i) shall be omitted'."

The reason being, Sir, that we thought on consideration of Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar's amendment that it was very sound and that clause (b) of section 537 was of no use.

The motion was adopted.

Clause 144 as amended, was added to the Bill.

Clauses 145, 146, 147, 148 and 149 were added to the Bill.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: I beg to move:

"That in clause 150 for the words 'and not' the words 'and the method of recovery of which is not' be substituted."

The motion was adopted.

Clause 150, as amended, was added to the Bill.

Clauses 151, 152, 153 and 154 were added to the Bill.

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu: I propose that the consideration of the Schedule may be postponed till Wednesday.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: I move:

"That in clause 155 the necessary amendments be made to give effect to the decision of the House with regard to compoundable offences."

Mr. President: The question is that in clause 155 the necessary consequential amendments be made to give effect to the decision of this House in relation to compoundable offences.

The motion was adopted.

Clause 155, as amended, was added to the Bill.

Clauses 156 and 157 were added to the Bill.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: I could have wished, Sir, that all our debates on this Bill had been conducted with a harmony such as now prevails. But we are approaching the end of our good work, though we seem to be pursuing it alone. I now propose:

"That in clause 158:

"(1) for subclause (i), (ii) the following be substituted, namely:

"(ii) the words 'and cannot be recovered by distress of the moveable property of the said (name of complainant)' shall be omitted."

Mr. President: The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was adopted.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: I move: Sir

"That in clause 158, in subclause (ii), for the word 'moveable' be omitted."

Mr. President: The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: The amendment that clause 158 is amended stand part of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: The question is that clause 157 stand part of the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

Sir Henry Moncreiff Smith: Sir, with the kind leave of the House I should like to move the following amendment:

"That after clause 156 of the Bill the following clause be inserted, namely:

"160. This Act shall come into force as amended to as the Governor General in Council may by order in the Gazette of India report."

The reason for the amendment, Sir, is, I think, obvious. When the Legislature is making a very large number of amendments in the Code of Criminal Procedure applicable to the whole country, unless we have a commencement clause of this kind then a law will come into force when it is assented to by the Governor General. It is obvious that we must give considerable notice to the Magistrates and to the lawyers of this country of the amendments that are being made, so that on one particular date which may be appointed hereafter, the whole of the new law shall come into force.

Mr. President: The question is that that clause be added to the Bill.

The motion was adopted.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Sir, we have one or two clauses which we postponed for final consideration on previous occasions. But I do not think we could very well proceed to their discussion this evening, and I would therefore suggest, Sir, that, if you have no objection, we might now adjourn the further consideration of the Criminal Procedure Code.

The Assembly then adjourned till Eleven of the Clock on Wednesday, the 14th February, 1923.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.

Wednesday, 14th February, 1923.

The Assembly met in the Assembly Chamber at Eleven of the Clock.
Mr. President was in the Chair.

MEMBER SWORN:

Mr. Lancelot Graham, M.L.A. (Legislative Department: Nominated Official).

UNSTARRED QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

DEATHS IN DELHI DUE TO COMMISSION OF AN OFFENCE.

163. Lala Girdharilal Agarwala: 1. How many dead bodies of human beings were discovered in Delhi including an area within 5 miles of Viceregal Lodge during the last 5 years, in which cases death was reported to have been caused by violence or commission of an offence and in how many of those cases the offender remained unpunished?

2. How many cases of deaths by violence or commission of an offence were reported or discovered in Delhi including an area within 5 miles of the Viceregal Lodge and in how many of them no offender was punished?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley: The two parts of the question appear to cover the same ground. During the years 1918 to 1922 the number of deaths reported as due to the commission of an offence in the area specified was 60. Of these 9 were found to be due to natural causes. Of the remaining 51 cases 24 were untraced, and in the 27 cases committed for trial, the accused were acquitted in 8 and convicted in 19 cases.

HISTORICAL BUILDINGS IN DELHI FORT.

164. Mr. Mohammad Faiyaz Khan: Will the Government be pleased to state the number of Historical Buildings pulled down in the Delhi Fort since 1900?

The Honourable Mr. A. C. Chatterjee: No Historical Buildings have been pulled down in the Delhi Fort since 1900.

HISTORICAL BUILDINGS IN AGRA FORT.

165. Mr. Mohammad Faiyaz Khan: Is there any truth in the statement that some of the Historical Buildings in the Fort, Agra, are going to be demolished for making barracks for soldiers?

The Honourable Mr. A. C. Chatterjee: There is no truth in the statement.

IMPORTS OF MOTOR CARS AND CYCLES.

166. Mr. Mohammad Faiyaz Khan: Will the Government be pleased to state the number of motor cars, and motor cycles imported into India each year from 1905 till the end of 1922 from England, United States of America, Canada, France, Germany and Italy?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: The Honourable Member is referred to the "Annual Statement of the Sea-borne Trade of British India" and "Monthly Accounts relating to the Sea-borne Trade and Navigation of British India" which contain all the statistical information available about the import of motor cars and motor cycles. A copy of these publications is in the Library.

THE INDIAN COTTON CESS BILL.

Mr. J. Hullah (Revenue and Agriculture Secretary): Sir, I present the report of the Joint Committee on the Bill to provide for the creation of a fund for the improvement and development of the growing, marketing and manufacture of cotton in India.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes (Commerce and Industries Member): Sir, I have to make a statement which I am sure that everybody in the House will receive with great regret. The Honourable Leader of the House is unavoidably prevented from being present to-day. He was taken ill in the night and cannot possibly take his seat this morning. I am sure I am expressing the hope of every one in this House when I say that we all hope that he will not be long prevented from discharging his duties in this House. (Hear, hear.)

THE REPEALING AND AMENDING BILL.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith (Secretary, Legislative Department): Sir, I move for leave to introduce a Bill to amend certain enactments and to repeal certain other enactments.

I do not think, Sir, that I need enter into an elaborate explanation of the provisions of this Bill. It is a Bill which the Central Legislature has laid before it from time to time to remove certain formal defects that are occasionally discovered in our law and to remove certain anachronisms. If Honourable Members will refer to the Schedule of the Bill which is in their hands, they will see that there is a column of explanations. Those explanations, Sir, give the reason for every small amendment which this Bill proposes to make in the Statute Book.

Mr. President: The question is.

"That leave be given to introduce a Bill to amend certain enactments and to repeal certain other enactments."

The motion was adopted.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Sir, I introduce the Bill.

THE CODE OF CRIMINAL PROCEDURE (AMENDMENT) BILL.

Mr. President: The Assembly will now proceed further to consider the Bill further to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, and the Courts Act, 1870, as passed by the Council of State.

The amendment to clause 11 standing in the name of Mr. Agnihotri was under consideration. Discussion will now proceed on clause 11. The amendment put from the Chair on the occasion when clause 11 was under consideration was:

"In clause 11 for the proposed sub-section (3) in sub-clause (2), substitute the following:

"(3) Every person arrested under this section shall forthwith be released on bail."

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith (Secretary, Legislative Department): Sir, this matter was before the House on a former occasion. It was then postponed because there was a general feeling in the House that this was not the proper place for this amendment and that we should consider it when we came to the Chapter of the Code which deals with bail. When, Sir, we did come to the Chapter which deals with bail, the Honourable Mover of this amendment had his attention invited to the point and he said he was not prepared to move amendments to section 496 or 497. I think the House will agree that the amendment that now stands before it is not a proper amendment to make in the Code. Mr. Agnihotri would enable or rather would require any person arrested without a warrant to be forthwith released on bail unless he was a proclaimed offender under clause thirdly or a deserter under clause sixthly. I would point out to the House that this would require all the persons under clause first to be released on bail as soon as they were arrested. Clause first is the clause under which nearly every serious criminal is arrested in the course of police investigations. In the course of an investigation of any serious crime the police arrest a man as soon as they have reasonable grounds for believing that he has committed the offence. They never wait, Sir, to get a warrant from a Court. Therefore, these persons are arrested without a warrant—persons who have been caught shortly after the committing of a murder, dacoity who were being pursued by the police after committing dacoity, and so on,—and these persons whom the police have been fortunate enough to arrest without delay would, under Mr. Agnihotri's amendment, be required to be released forthwith on bail. I think, Sir, the House will agree that this is going much too far and it is a most undesirable amendment to introduce into the Code. The House has had a very full discussion on sections 496 and 497 and it was pointed out to the House on Monday that the provisions of the Code as to bail were now far more lenient than they ever had been and the Government deprecated any further widening or loosening of the provisions. Sir, I oppose this amendment.

The amendment was negatived.

Clause 11, as amended, was added to the Bill.

Mr. President: Discussion will now proceed on clause 33.

Mr. H. Tonkinson (Home Department: Nominated Official): Sir, we postponed the consideration of this clause for two purposes. In the first place we wished to deal with the question which arises from the prevention by this clause of the use of the statements recorded by police officers for any purpose at any inquiry or trial in respect of any offence under investigation at the time when such statement was made. The second reason why the consideration was postponed was to examine the effect of the amendment which has been accepted by the Assembly which compels the Court to allow inspection of the whole of these statements to the accused. As regards this question the position was indicated by the Honourable the Leader of the House in his statement on the 31st of January. He said then :

" Many of my friends here have, I think, a feeling that it is justifiable, in view of the previous decision of the House, to place in the Bill some proviso which would obviate the danger, to which many of us referred, of the whole of the statements referring to a large number of transactions being handed to the defence."

My Honourable friends, Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary and Mr. Hussanally, were both clear on that point that some amendment of the provision was required. Well, Sir, we have considered this question at length and we have decided that no proviso which does not practically nullify the amendment made by the Assembly would be effective. The alternatives before us if the clause stands as it does now are that either detection will be practically impossible or else proper prosecution of cases in the Magistrates' Courts will be impossible. In these circumstances, Sir, we consider that either this clause must be set right in another place or else in the alternative the whole clause should be omitted and we should return to the existing law. It will be possible to consider that question later.

I now turn to the first point and I wish now to move the amendment of which I spoke on the 31st of January. The position as regards this amendment was indicated by the Honourable the Law Member in his statement on the 26th of January when he said after the amendment moved by Mr. Pantulu had been rejected :

" Sir, with your permission I should like to say a few words. My Honourable friend, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar, and other Honourable gentlemen having agreed to the retention of the concluding words in this clause, we have, as must have become clear from the division which has just taken place, agreed to the retention of the words 'for any purpose' instead of 'as evidence'; and I understand the position now to be that Honourable Members are prepared to accept the clause as it originally stands in the Bill. But I must make it clear that this will not in any way affect the provision embodied in section 172."

Then, my Honourable friend, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar, remarked " subject to any further amendments."

The amendment which I then referred to, Sir, is I think an amendment accepted by Honourable Members opposite in principle. We wish to be able to use these statements to just exactly the same extent as the Court is now able to use the diary, and no more.

Dr. H. S. Gour (Nagpur Division: Non-Muhammadian): No, that was not agreed to.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: If the Court is not able to use these statements in exactly the same way as the Court is now able to use the diary, that is to assist it, to aid it in the inquiry or trial, then there is practically no use in recording these statements at all. I therefore, Sir, move :

" That in clause 33 of the proposed new sub-section (ii) of section 62, the following proviso be added, namely :

" Provided further that the court may in the course of the inquiry or trial, send for the record of any such statement and may use such statement not as evidence in the case, but to aid it in the inquiry or trial."

Those are exactly the words of section 172.

Dr. H. S. Gour: Sir, as I told the Honourable Mr. Tonkinson on the last occasion, statements made to a police officer cannot legitimately be used to the prejudice of the accused. They are statements which may be used for the purpose of benefitting the defence, but never to its prejudice. I have no doubt the Honourable Member is not unaware of the leading case known as Dhal Singh's case. That was a case, Sir, in which a certain learned judge convicted the accused upon statements recorded by a police officer in the case diary. That case went to the Privy Council and the Privy Council observed that it was irregular and improper for a judge to use statements recorded in a case diary, which had never been subjected to cross-examination by the accused, to his prejudice, that such statements were intended to be used for the purpose of checking the evidence adduced by the prosecution, but not for the purpose of supplementing that evidence. It is like a judge using statements not accessible to the accused upon which the accused has had no chance of cross-examining the witnesses, and which so far as the statements are concerned are wholly unknown to him. I submit, Sir, the proviso which my friend, the Honourable Mr. Tonkinson, wishes to introduce in the Code will do away with the principle enunciated by their Lordships of the Privy Council, and which has been worked in practice by the courts in this country. I have no doubt my Honourable and learned friend, Sir Henry Stanyon, who has had long forensic and judicial experience of the administration of criminal law, will bear me out when I say that it would be dangerous to allow statements recorded in the police diary to be used as an aid by the judge in the disposal of criminal cases, and I therefore, Sir, oppose the amendment. The Honourable Mover of this amendment, in the course of his speech, referred to the acceptance of his view by Members on this side of the House. I think, Sir, I am voicing the sentiments of the Members on this side of the House when I say that it was never understood by any one that such a statement should ever be admissible in evidence, or be used as an aid by the judge concerned in the trial of criminal cases to the prejudice of the accused.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Sir, I think, in spite of what my Honourable friend, Dr. Gour, has said, it is a fact that on the previous occasion when this matter was discussed, there was a feeling in this House that some amendment was necessary to get rid of the effect of the words "for any purpose." Dr. Gour's remarks on this amendment have lacked their usual relevancy; in fact I doubted, as I listened to Dr. Gour, whether he understood the amendment which my friend, Mr. Tonkinson, had put forward. Dr. Gour cited one case on which he based the whole of his arguments. He said it was a case in which police diaries had been improperly used by a Court as evidence to corroborate and substantiate the case for the prosecution. Sir, that undoubtedly was a most improper case, but it has nothing whatever to do with the amendment which Mr. Tonkinson is now putting before the House. Sir, in the first place, we are not dealing with police diaries, we are dealing with statements. In the second place, we are not proposing to use those statements as evidence, we are merely proposing to enable the court to use them in exactly the same manner as the court can use the police diaries under section 172 of the Code.

Colonel Sir Henry Stanyon (United Provinces: European): Sir, with all respect, I am unable to understand the attitude taken up by Government in regard to this matter. This House has resolved, with regard to statements made by persons in the course of the police investigation,—persons who afterwards come up as witnesses at the trial,—that the accused shall have access to those statements and be furnished with copies of them. It has been said in general terms, but has not been sufficiently defined so as to make me capable of understanding it, that such a provision will make the prosecution of cases impossible. A witness comes up the day after a murder and says that he saw a person like the accused hurrying away from the place where the murder was committed. Later on he comes before the Magistrate and says

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: May I point out that these remarks are irrelevant. Mr. Tonkinson is not in the House for the moment, but Mr. Tonkinson's amendment relates to the words "for any purpose"

Dr. H. S. Gour: May I rise to a point of order? Who is presiding here to determine whether the remarks are in order or not?

Mr. President: Order, order. The Honourable Member may leave the Chair to decide for itself. Sir Henry Stanyon.

Colonel Sir Henry Stanyon: I was putting forward an illustration in connection with a remark made, in introducing the amendment, by Mr. Tonkinson who said that if the original amendment before the House became law, prosecutions would be impossible. As I was saying, this witness comes up at the trial and states that with his own eyes he saw the accused committing the murder. Now is it or is it not just that everybody concerned with the prosecution and the defence, including the judge and the witness, should know of these differences in statement and should have some explanation of them from the witness? How is the prosecution rendered impossible? Conviction may be rendered impossible—that is another thing—but how is the prosecution rendered impossible by the fact of these two different statements being made public. The amendment which is to-day proposed to be introduced adds another instance to a difficulty which already exists. It is suggested that, like the case diary, these statements may be sent for and used by the Court for the purpose of aiding it in its inquiry and trial. "Used by the Court"—in what way? To influence its judgment? To affect it with regard to the credibility of a witness? If so, then, in fact, but not in the name of law, that statement is being used as evidence. My friend, Dr. Gour, cited Dhal Singh's case, not quite accurately. An influential landlord was convicted of murder and sentenced to death. The case came before the High Court of the province, before a Bench of which I was a member. I was responsible for writing the judgment.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Sir, I rise to a point of order. The remarks of my Honourable and learned friend have nothing to do with the amendment now before the House. They refer, I think, Sir, entirely to the question of the provision—which will come up for discussion immediately afterwards—which was introduced by the Assembly on the 31st January, namely, the right given to the defence to inspect the evidence.

Mr. President: Has the Honourable Member anything to say on that point?

Colonel Sir Henry Stanyon: My intention was to show that in that case an open reference was made to case diary statements and that was criticised by their Lordships of the Privy Council (to whose decision we must all bow) instead of, as would have been the more correct procedure, for the Judges to allow themselves to be secretly influenced by those same statements. They were honest enough to say in their judgment: "this is what makes us disbelieve the evidence for the defence." That is all that happened in that case. The conviction was upheld by their Lordships of the Privy Council. However, the point is this, that what is now sought to be introduced is another attempt to allow the prosecution to whisper in the ear of the Court. That is a principle which I respectfully submit is opposed to the rules of justice as understood in Great Britain and in British India. I cannot see to what disadvantage anybody concerned is put by the accused knowing what a witness who is giving fatal evidence against him had previously said.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Again, Sir, that is entirely irrelevant to the amendment before the House.

Colonel Sir Henry Stanyon: If the Honourable the President rules me out of order I shall bow to his decision. I say that this amendment would exaggerate and increase the evil of this whispering in the ear of the Court. I, therefore, strongly oppose the amendment.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar (Madras: Nominated Non-Official): Sir, there are two points which ought to be kept distinct. The one is that this amendment does not go against the amendment carried in this House as regards the use of statements to the Police by the accused. This amendment does not affect it. As regards the propriety of the amendment, I respectfully agree with everything that was said by the Honourable Sir Henry Stanyon upon the matter. On the last occasion, when a similar matter came up, I pointed out that this would amount to what is known technically as "corrupting justice." A Magistrate should have access only to such papers upon which he is to base his judgment: he should have nothing else before him. If his mind is to be prejudiced by looking into certain records which are not open to the accused the result of it will be that the accused will be in a very difficult position, the Magistrate's mind having been secretly biased against him by his having looked into certain papers which he has no access to. And, moreover, as I said on the last occasion and I repeat it again, it is of the essence of criminal justice that the Magistrate's mind should be free from any taint of suspicion, that is favouring the accused or favouring the prosecution. If you put into his hand a statement which is not to be used as evidence, in which he is not to base his judgment, then you allow his judgment to be influenced by a document which is not public property. Sir, it is a dangerous thing to do and I do not think that anybody in this House agreed to an amendment of this nature being introduced. We never agreed to an amendment being introduced which would put into the hands of Magistrates a weapon which he can use against the accused without the accused having an opportunity of putting up any defence. Under these circumstances, I strongly oppose the amendment which has been proposed from the Government Benches.

Mr. Harchandrai Vishindas (Sind: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, apart from the considerations which have been put forward in opposing the amendment, I think there is one great objection of principle to be raised against the form of the amendment proposed. It is practically a kind of giving with one hand and taking away with the other, or first laying down a principle and then qualifying it 100 per cent. Because the first part of the amendment proposes to exclude these statements from the category of evidence whereas the second part, although worded differently, actually keeps them as part of the evidence. I think it is wrong in principle to introduce legislation on these lines at all. Of course, it may be considered to be a strong word, but I think it is the proper word, to say that such a kind of legislation is "misleading." It misleads those who are responsible for the administration of justice, because a conscientious Magistrate or Judge, while looking at this section, will be puzzled as to what interpretation to put upon it. He would say to himself "if I am not to use it as evidence I am to use it as an aid to the administration of justice." How is it to be an aid to the administration of justice? Therefore, apart from the arguments on the merits which have been put forward by various speakers, I say it is a wrong principle to have any law of this kind on the Statute Book.

Mr. P. E. Percival (Bombay: Nominated Official): Sir, I wish to make one point clearer. As I understand the amendment, it is simply to the effect that these statements should be used in the same way as police diaries are used at the present moment. The question of showing the statements to the accused does not arise.

Dr. H. S. Gour: What is the meaning of "use it as an aid."

Mr. P. E. Percival: The amendment does not touch the question of showing the statements to the accused, or of keeping the statements away from the accused. The amendment only is to the effect that the statements of witnesses taken by the police may be used by the Court in exactly the same way as police diaries are at present used by the Court, and to which use no objection has been taken, nor has there been any opposition thereto in this Assembly up to now. Section 172 makes it quite clear that police diaries cannot be used as evidence, but can be used as an aid in such inquiry or trial. Now, under section 162, as it now stands, statements of witnesses to the police cannot be used for any purpose, unless we make the necessary amendment in section 162; and even if this amendment is made they can be used only for the same purpose as police diaries are used. It seems to me that if this amendment is not made, the only practical result will be that the police officers will include all depositions in their diaries instead of including them, as they should include them, in the statements of the witnesses. It is not a question—I wish to make this clear—one way or the other of showing the statements to the accused person. That is an entirely different question. The only question is whether the Courts should not be allowed to use these statements in exactly the same way as police diaries are used, and no objection has been taken by this Assembly to the use of such diaries up till now.

The amendment was negatived.

Mr. President: The question is that clause 33, as amended, stand part of the Bill.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Sir, clause 33, as it now stands, is to my mind quite an impossible clause. It has two defects. One defect has arisen from the fact that the House has just refused to pass the amendment moved by my Honourable friend, Mr. Tonkinson. We have it now that the statements recorded by the police cannot be used for any purpose whatever. What we had suggested was that those statements should be used in exactly the same manner as the police diaries can be used and for exactly the same purposes for which the police diaries can be used under section 172. The second defect in clause 33 has been already referred to by Mr. Tonkinson this morning. We have now an absolute requirement, a mandate to the courts, when every witness steps into the witness box, to hand the defence a copy of the statement which that witness has made to the police. Sir, I do not want to re-open the discussion on this particular point. It was pointed out to the House the other day that it was very dangerous to hand over the whole statement. Mr. Hussanally pointed out that it was very dangerous to hand over the whole statement and Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary entirely agreed. He said that we must have something that will make it possible for the Court to hand over at all events only such part as may be relevant or such part as may in the opinion of the Court be essential to hand over in the interests of justice. Sir, there section 162 stands. Statements made to the police cannot be used for any purpose, and they have nevertheless to be handed over in their entirety to the defence the moment the witness steps into the witness-box. I think, Sir, if the House would try to realise what the effect of that is, they would agree that the administration of justice will be most seriously hampered. What I want to suggest to the House is that rather than allow this clause to pass in this form—Government, Sir, will never, so far as they can help it, allow this clause to emerge from the Legislature in this form—the House should take the very simple expedient of deleting the clause entirely from the Bill and leaving section 162 of the Code as it stands unamended. Sir, we have a large number of rulings on section 162 of the Code as it stands. Those rulings are a guide to the Magistracy with reference to the use of statements made to the police. Those statements, Sir, can be handed to the defence for the purpose of contradicting witnesses and that is about all section 162 amounts to. I would therefore suggest to the House that on this motion that clause 33 as amended stand part of the Bill, it should give a negative vote which, as I say, will merely have the effect of maintaining section 162 in the law unamended. Government, as I said, Sir, will strenuously oppose to the very last moment clause 33 standing in the Bill in its present form. It will undoubtedly be necessary to take the matter before another House and try to persuade that other House to take a more reasonable view of the matter. I therefore, Sir, propose myself to vote against the standing of this clause in the Bill and I hope the House will support me in this matter.

Mr. W. M. Hussanally (Sind: Muhammadan Rural): Sir, as my name has been mentioned by the Honourable Sir Moncrieff Smith, I think that I should point out to the House that if the amendment which I had then proposed and actually handed over to the Secretary of the Assembly had been accepted by the Government, all this difficulty would have been avoided. I proposed on the last occasion, that the Magistrate or the Court should have authority in special cases, for reasons to be recorded, to disallow copies of statements of witnesses being given to the accused. That amendment of mine was unfortunately not accepted by the Government and that has led to all this difficulty at this moment. As for the threat Sir Moncrieff Smith has held out to the House of the Government not agreeing to this clause being passed in this form and of their intention to move the other House to negative this clause and to amend it again, I do not think for a moment this House will be afraid of it and should not be. But to make matters more practical I would still propose the amendment which I then handed over to the Secretary of the Assembly, and if I am permitted to move it even at this stage by the Chair as well as by the Government, I think all difficulty will be avoided and the clause as then passed will have the effect of having everything that the Government wants.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar (Madras City: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Sir, I stand aghast at the attitude adopted by the Honourable Sir Monieriff Smith. What is it, Sir, that this Assembly has done to merit the covert rebuke which he has administered to it? He is going to appeal to a more reasonable Assembly! Sir, what is his complaint? His complaint is that this House adopted clause 162 as proposed by Government. Clause (1) of section 162, if Honourable Members will turn to page 12 they will find, has been adopted to its fullest extent by this House; I mean clause 33—section 162, clause (1). There was an attempt made by my Honourable friend, Mr. Pantulu Garu, to amend it. That attempt failed. So, the clause now accepted by the House is the very one proposed by Government. If he has any reason to be dissatisfied with anybody, he has reason to be dissatisfied with himself and his colleagues on the Treasury Bench. It is they that proposed this clause and this House had the good sense to accept the reasonable proposal made by the Government. Now, therefore, I do not see what the charge against this House is, that he should hold out this threat that he is going to another House, a more reasonable House,—a House in a more reasonable mood or more reasonable House, whatever it may be. Again turning to the proviso what is the crime, Sir, which this Assembly has committed? All that this Assembly has done is, it has modified the proviso as introduced by the Government. That is to say, we have provided that the accused should not be tried in the dark, that the accused should not be convicted on perjured evidence and that the prosecution should not hold up its sleeve former contradictory statements made by witnesses. The prosecution at a particular stage puts forward a witness as a witness to truth. The accused is given the right to inspect former statements made by that witness. Have we committed a very grave sin in giving that opportunity to the accused person who stands to lose his liberty and probably his life, because we give him an opportunity to inspect the previous statement made by a witness in the box? Certainly, I do not think any House, if it has any reason behind it, if it has any reason in its head, would object to such a clause, to such a power being given to the accused person when he is on his defence for his liberty and for his life. Sir, we are threatened with all sorts of horrors, all this arises out of the imaginary fear that the witness might have spoken not only to the particular case under investigation but to other cases—and this happens in very rare cases. That can be avoided by other methods. Why? Instructions can be given to police officers if really you are going to get a witness who will go about telling other stories than the story connected with the particular case then under investigation, to put those statements down not in the particular statement, but in their diaries, in which case it will be safe from inspection by the accused. Not only that. The Court has ample power always to instruct the pleader who appears—pleaders are officers of Courts—"you are not to use such and such portions because they do not relate to the accused." I suppose you can trust the pleader with a sense of responsibility. I suppose pleaders are amenable to the disciplinary jurisdiction of the Courts. I have known cases where the most confidential papers are handed over to Counsel for accused because they are trusted and they ought to be trusted. In any administration, in any civilised administration pleaders should be trusted. Therefore, I do not think any real serious risk is taken. The risk that there might be statements relating to other matters may be avoided by the policeman not recording it in the particular record, but in his diary and Government can certainly give instructions to that effect to the police officers. Even otherwise, the Court, if the accused is defended by a pleader, can trust the pleader to use his discretion in the matter. It is not every matter which is introduced in a Court which is made public. Is there not power in the Court to say, if it is really such a serious case where the witness has disclosed facts which are going to affect the public interests or the interests of the State or the safety of the State—the Court is not powerless to hold the hearing in camera and not allow it to be published? Therefore, there are ways by which these imaginary fears can be safeguarded. Such being the case, this House has done but bare justice to the accused. This is a thing in which the people of this country have been agitating for a long time, namely, that this sort of secret trial, the policeman holding up in his sleeve certain statements given by a witness and not being at liberty to disclose them to the accused person who is on his trial, is a grave reflection upon the administration of criminal justice in this country. I am glad that this House has risen to the occasion and removed that reproach from that administration. Rather than being sorry for it, I hope the Government will be glad that they are, at any rate, at the last moment doing justice to the accused persons who are on their trial.

Mr. President: Do I understand the Honourable Member from Karachi to move his amendment?

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: If I am permitted to do so.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"In the proviso in clause 33 after the words 'Indian Evidence Act, 1872' add the words 'unless for special reasons to be recorded the Magistrate deems it inexpedient to grant a copy when he shall refuse to do so.'"

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: May I ask for a ruling from you, Sir, whether this amendment should not be taken to have been vetoed when it was not moved on the last occasion? It was on the paper but it was not moved.

Dr. H. S. Gour: The amendment now proposed to be moved will be inconsistent with the amendment already carried by the House.

Mr. President: The amendment was handed at the table in manuscript, and as far as I know it was never on the amendment paper.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: If I remember aright, the Honourable Member had handed it over to the Chair. He says he handed it to the Secretary of the Assembly who must have handed it over to the Chair, and I take it from the fact that he did not move it or press it that it was given up.

Mr. President: It was never moved. It was certainly not put from the Chair and the question could not come before the House until it was put from the Chair on a motion moved.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: If I understand aright, the position was this. Mr. Hussanally had not sent in his amendment in proper time. He had brought it later on and objection was taken on the Government side that it was not in proper time and therefore it should not be allowed to be moved. That is what, if I am right, took place. In those circumstances it was not pressed. Therefore, not having been allowed to move it as it was not in proper time, is it now open to the Honourable Member to move it again? A number of amendments in that way were rejected.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas (Bombay City: Non-Muhammadan Urban): My own recollection of the case is this. In the course of a speech my Honourable friend, Mr. Hussanally, made a suggestion that if an amendment of this kind were embodied the amended clause might be acceptable to the Government, but no such amendment was moved by him, until at the end he said, "I am prepared to move," and then the Government I think said, "Well, it can be left to another occasion."

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: I think Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas has correctly pointed out what happened on the last occasion.

Mr. President: The Official Report gives no indication whatsoever that the Honourable Member from Karachi moved any motion at all. The words with which he brought his speech to a close were:

"I would, therefore, Sir, with your permission suggest a sort of compromise between the two parties."

That is a long way from moving an amendment. Again it says:

"A compromise of this kind would suit both sides, and ought to be accepted by the Government as well as by my friends on this side."

Presumably, he threw out the idea in order to see whether it would catch on, and apparently it did not catch on. The Honourable Member is perfectly entitled to move the amendment now.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: We have had no notice of this amendment and I take objection to its being moved now. If you allow it, it is another matter.

Mr. President: As the Honourable Member has just been pointing out, though formal notice has not been given, he has known the substance of the amendment since the 31st of January. The amendment is now before the House for consideration.

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: So far as I am concerned, I have nothing more to add to what I have already said.

Sir Montagu Webb (Bombay: European): May I ask that the amendment may be read out again as we have not got copies of it?

Mr. President: "In the proviso in clause 33 insert after the words 'Indian Evidence Act, 1872' the words 'unless for special reasons to be recorded the Magistrate deems it inexpedient to grant a copy when he shall refuse to do so'."

The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. President: The question is that clause 33, as amended, stand part of the Bill.

Mr. P. B. Haigh (Bombay: Nominated Official): Sir, I wish to refer to the speech just made on the general clause 33 by Mr. Rangachariar. I fear, Sir, that on this occasion in the opening part of his speech Mr. Rangachariar has departed from his usual fairness. He asked with indignation and scorn why the Government found fault with the Honourable Members sitting round Mr. Rangachariar because they had opposed clause 33 which was drafted by Government. Sir, I think we may complain that that is a merely debating point. Clause 33, if Honourable Members will refer to page 21, includes the whole of section 162, that is printed in italics.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: I said 162 (1) in clause 33. My wording was very exact.

Mr. P. B. Haigh: What difference does that make? Mr. Rangachariar spoke scornfully of Government because they complained that Honourable Members had passed clause 162 (1). 162 (1) contains a proviso. I ask the House to direct its attention to the exact wording. "No statement made by any person to a police officer, etc., shall be used for any purpose save as hereinafter provided." Then follows the proviso: "Provided that it may be used in particular circumstances therein detailed." That proviso has been cut out entirely by the amendment.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: The proviso is there.

Mr. P. B. Haigh: That proviso has been entirely changed in character by the amendment passed the other day and the first part of section 162 (1) is therefore rendered entirely meaningless. That is why Government justly object to having the clause passed as it has now been amended.

I wish to pass on to Mr. Rangachariar's general review of the position that has now been created by the amendment that was passed the other day. I would ask the House to remember that if a police officer is making a careful investigation of a case, then, in order to aid his own memory, in order that he may know exactly what every witness has said, he must if he is to do his work thoroughly in a difficult case take down the statements of important witnesses. And these statements cannot at that stage of investigation be expected to contain only matters that are strictly relevant to the inquiry and to the case as it will appear against the accused who is perhaps at this moment unknown. If the clause is passed, those statements must now be placed in toto in the hands of an accused person as soon as a witness who made them goes into the box. They will fall into the hands of the accused and he will thereby be possessed of all the information that was given by that witness to the police officer in the course of the inquiry whether it refers to the particular accused present, who is now in the box, or to other persons who have perhaps no connection with the crime or to persons who may be supposed to have had connection with the crime and are not yet detected or apprehended. All these things are to go into the hands of the accused. But Mr. Rangachariar says this can be easily cured. Why do not the superior officers of police or executive officers give instructions to their investigating officers, inspector and sub-inspectors, only to take down the statements in a proper manner. Now, Sir, I am surprised that a lawyer of experience like the Honourable Member should make such a suggestion. It seems to me that he is practically inviting the subordinate investigating officers of police to take the statements that are going to appear as the statements of the accused. Those statements are not signed by witnesses making the deposition.

[Mr. P. B. Haigh.]

They are not recorded solemnly on oath or in an office with people standing about. They are taken down on bits of paper in village chavadis, under trees, anywhere; and any sort of paper could be produced in those circumstances by the police officer and he could say "This is what the witness said to me and it fits in perfectly with his deposition in Court." A suggestion that instructions of this kind should be issued amounts to inviting subordinate police officers to prepare false statements in order to assist their case. Then there was another suggestion. There is no need, says the Honourable Member, for Government to be alarmed. Surely, he says, the Courts have power to prevent any mischief being done. The court can advise the pleader for the accused that grave public interests are involved, that he must not refer in the course of his speech to certain portions of the statements which he has just been allowed to see, that the matter must be kept entirely concealed. The pleader for the accused is, we are told, an officer of the court. He is subject to discipline. But I ask, what about the accused? The accused is not an officer of the court. The accused is the person who is to see these statements. There is nothing in section 162 about the statements being merely shown to the counsel or pleader for the accused or to an officer of the court. The accused is to see them. It is he who will find out exactly what witnesses have deposed against him or his associates. It is he who will be in a position to know what things have been suggested to the police about persons perhaps not connected with the case at all. Does the Honourable Member seriously suggest that no mischief can be done, that the court has full power, by merely instructing a pleader, to keep the matter confidential, to prevent any mischief being done. The Honourable Member knows perfectly well that if these statements are shown in their entirety to the accused person, there may on occasions be grave risk of injury to innocent persons and injury to the interests of the State. And yet he thinks that all this can be set aside by the mere suggestion that the court has full power to prevent any harm being done. I trust that the House containing as it does so many members of practical judicial experience will not accept an argument of this kind from the Honourable Member.

Finally the suggestion came from the Honourable Member that the court can always get over the matter by holding the case in camera. Sir, I am astounded that such a suggestion should come from the Honourable Member opposite. Even if the case is held in camera what difference does it make. The accused will see all these papers. The accused will be able to disclose the information. The accused will have every power to bring about injury to those who have spoken to the police against him and against his friends. Sir, this is really a serious matter which will gravely hamper the administration of justice and I submit that Government are perfectly justified in stating that as they have failed to persuade this House to reject that amendment, if they cannot persuade the House to reject the whole clause as it stands and restore the old clause, they will take the matter up in another House and safeguard the proper administration of public justice in the manner provided for by the constitution of this country. I trust that the House will reject this clause.

Dr. H. S. Gour: I am afraid the Honourable Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith has unnecessarily added a tone in the course of this discussion which I strongly deprecate and I do not think my Honourable friend, Mr. Haigh, was even entitled to refer to the powers of another House and to the veiled threat that if this House is not amenable to reason, an appeal will be made to another House to correct its errors. As to this part of the constitution, it was quite unnecessary to remind this House about it. This House must decide this question fearlessly, and undismayed by any threat of correction by any other House or in any other place. I pass on, Sir, to reply to the more material objections raised by the Honourable Members. The Honourable Mr. Haigh saw daggers in the air, he told us that it will be a monstrous thing if statements recorded by the police officer in the course of an investigation were revealed to the accused, because those statements may contain other statements highly prejudicial to the interests of the State and which it would be therefore prejudicial to disclose to the accused. I am perfectly certain that the Honourable speaker was not unaware of the provisions of the Act of 1882, the old Criminal Procedure Code, which preceded the present enactment of 1898. What was the practice then? And how far was the safety of the State imperilled by the statements which were then available to the accused, and copies of which were delivered to him? Can my friends on the other side cite a single example that during these long years the statements taken by the police officer and made available to the accused ran the risk of which the Treasury Benches complain and of which their supporters, including the Honourable Member from Bombay, complain? That, I submit, is a short answer to the fears and apprehensions on the part of the Government Benches. I go further and say—you try the accused, the police officer has made an investigation into his case, the first statements of the witnesses have been taken down by him, these are the statements upon which the accused has been brought up on his trial. These statements have been subsequently improved upon or added to. The accused sees the statements made before the Court, and demands that contradictory statements made by the witnesses before the police should be made available to him so that his previous statements to the police be used to contradict him. Such a procedure is not only allowable by law but is directly contemplated in certain sections of the Indian Evidence Act which lays down that a witness may be contradicted with reference to his previous statements. His previous statements are there. The law allows that a witness may be contradicted with reference to his previous statements. What is the answer if the Government when they refuse the accused the permission to refer to statements which the law allows and which is a legitimate subject for cross-examination? It cannot be denied that witnesses in the course of the trial, as the case develops, keep on changing their statements. I do not say it is an invariable practice, but I do say that in many cases the true test and sometimes the sole test available to the accused is that the witness has gone back upon his previous statement which he made to the police and which he has since exaggerated for purposes best known to himself. If the Treasury Benches refuse to give copies of these statements, I ask them how is the accused to challenge the credibility of witnesses tendered by the prosecution? We are told that the Magistrate will look into it. I am sure, Sir, my friend, the Honourable Mr. Haigh, was present in the House when I pointed out, and it was also pointed out by the Honourable Sir Henry Stanyon, that the Magistrate cannot be, and is not, the proper person to act as the accused's cross-examining counsel. The Magistrate's duty is to hold the balance even and to leave the prosecution and accused to conduct their case in the best way they can. To say that the Magistrate or the Court is entitled to refer to these statements, as is embodied in the provision now before the House but not bound to give a copy of these statements to the accused, is to say that the Court has to find out what is in the mind of the accused and to di-work which is the legitimate work of the accused's counsel. How is the Court to know upon what points the counsel for the accused is going to cross-examine these witnesses? What is his defence, and for what purposes he wishes to use the statements of these witnesses made to the police in the course of the investigation? These are all matters of very serious importance, and those who have practised at the bar or presided on the Bench know too well that the provision, the existing provision, namely, that the Court shall refer to the statement, is wholly inadequate, and in many cases wholly illusory to protect the accused. I submit, therefore, that on the last occasion this House by a very large majority (A Voice: "Only by two")—then at any rate by a much larger majority on this occasion, should decide that it would be in the interests of justice as also in the interests of the accused, and it would be, as Mr. Rangachariar rightly pointed out, in consonance with consistency, that these statements should be made available to the accused. After all, we are making no innovation. We are after all treading upon the old beaten ground; we are going back to the old practice; the innovation introduced by the Amending Act of 1898 has been found to be inadequate and insufficient in practice. Consequently we are going back to the old law, and I do not think that there need be any apprehension on the part of the Members of the Government or anybody speaking on behalf of the Government that there is likely to be any danger to the State, or that the prosecution would fail in cases where they do not deserve to fail. I therefore submit, Sir, that the amendment which was accepted on the last occasion and which was endorsed by the vote of this House ought to be reaffirmed on this occasion.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Sir, I desire to object to the statements which have been made by two Honourable Members of this House to the effect that my Honourable friend Sir Henry Monieroff Smith used a threat. My Honourable friend merely said, what is a fact, that Government propose to use all their constitutional powers in putting this clause straight. That, Sir, is by no means a threat and I think it was quite a misnomer to say it was a threat. (Dr. H. S. Gour: "Was it intimidation?") My Honourable friend Dr. Gour refers once again to the Code of 1882. I stated on January 31st and I repeat now that we are not going back to the Code of 1882 by the proposal in the Bill. We are going to an entirely different position. The Code of 1882 did not, as my Honourable friend says, allow inspection of the whole of these statements to the accused person. I read out the provisions of section 162 on that occasion and there is not the least doubt about it that my Honourable friend's statement is in this respect incorrect. We are dealing, Sir, with a proposal to allow inspection of the whole of these statements to the accused. That, Sir, my Honourable friend Mr. Rangachariar thinks may be harmful in a few isolated cases. I say, Sir, that it will be harmful in almost all the cases which are under investigation in this country. There is practically no case, Sir, in which these statements do not include information as to the sources of police information, and it is quite impossible, Sir, for any Government without grave anxiety to allow such a clause as this to be enacted. I would now merely remind the House that they are proposing to do something which is not done in any country in the world.

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: Sir, may I ask the Honourable Member to read the provisions of section 162 in the Code of 1882: we have not got that Code before us

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Section 162 of the Code of 1882 runs as follows :

"No statement other than a dying declaration made by any person to a police officer in the course of an investigation under this chapter shall, if reduced to writing, be signed by the person making it or be used as evidence against the accused."

My Honourable friend Dr. Gour says we are going back to the law as embodied in that clause. He knows quite well that we are doing nothing of the sort.

Dr. H. S. Gour: If my Honourable friend is prepared to reproduce that section 162 we are prepared to accept it now.

Rao Bahadur C. S. Subrahmanayam (Madras ceded districts and Chittoor: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, the point in dispute seems to me to be very simple and I am afraid a good many things have been said which do not pertain to the matter in dispute. We are all agreed that statements made by a witness to a police officer relating to an accused person who is under trial before the Court ought to be shown to that accused person. Up to this point there is not much dispute. (A Voice: "A lot of dispute.") We have reached that stage. The danger which is now pointed out is that in the statement recorded by a police officer there may be matters relating to other persons who are not before the court. That is to say, a witness may give information to the police about matters in connection with people other than those before the court, and the objection is taken that matters relating to such persons ought not to be shown to the accused. A simple remedy for that is that a police officer should take care not to jumble up together matters connected with different people in one statement. Mr. Haigh said how is it possible for him not to mix up things; when a man makes a statement he may refer to several people. He added that it might end in police officers dressing up their statements or something like that. What I say is that a police officer before he takes down a witness's statement in writing naturally finds out orally what that witness can testify to. A policeman does not begin to write at once as soon as a witness begins to speak. He finds out the whole story first and then decides whether it is worth recording. That, I suppose, is admitted. A policeman is not a writing machine or a recording machine. He first examines a witness, finds out from him all the matters that he can speak of and then begins to write out his statement. Well, then, accepting the clause as passed by the Assembly, what the police officer has to do is to write out under separate heads the information which he knows he is going to get from witnesses. It will not be difficult to separate the details relating to one accused from those relating to another or to a person who is not involved in his inquiry. As I have said on another occasion, this will only make the policeman more careful and systematic in taking down these statements. And after all, statements which deal with a number of people are not of frequent occurrence. The cases about which so much anxiety is displayed by the Government Benches are not of frequent occurrence. It is only in rare cases, as those relating to a dacoit gang or in which a large number of people have conspired to commit an offence, in which there may be a witness who has been acquainted with the secrets of the gang or of the conspiracy—it is only in such cases that statements of an involved and complex character will be made. And these are very rare cases. In order to give a sort of protection in these rare cases, I do not think that the law should be altered so as to put in the hands of Magistrates the power to refuse or to exercise their discretion and then refuse inspection or a copy of statements of witnesses in ordinary cases. There is no use in the Government magnifying the dangers and difficulties. I am afraid for some reason or another, they have not taken a right perspective of this amendment. They have unnecessarily worked themselves up into a feeling that the whole administration of justice will crumple up and the State will be in grave danger if the accused are allowed inspection of these statements. What has been irregularly done, what has been done at great cost and what has been able to be done by wealthy people at the expenditure of a considerable sum of money, we ask now let it be the right of the poorest man as well to know what has been said by a witness. The importance of these previous statements has been referred to and I wish also to refer to it. A man says a certain rambling statement, almost amounting to hearsay, almost amounting to what he has heard, almost amounting to rumour, which is down in the record made by the policeman. But when he comes to Court to give evidence before a Magistrate some days afterwards, he gives a cut and dried, neat story, omitting all those things which would make it amount to hearsay or rumour and makes it straight and definite, in which case it is of great importance to the accused person to show up that witness and make the Court understand that this man has substantially improved his story and therefore he is not a reliable witness. And I am afraid any opposition to that course would simply make us believe that the Government is interested, as is the common repute, in getting persons accused of offences by hook or by crook, and, therefore, I deprecate very much the unnecessary anxiety and what has been styled to be a threat or the exposition of constitution under which we are working, that this section is the section on which the Government has pinned its faith and has staked its reputation.

Colonel Sir Henry Stanyon: Sir, we the non-official Members on this side of the House expect, and constantly receive—perhaps not as often as we should like, but still frequently—consideration from the Government of propositions which we submit for the opinion of this House, and I feel sure that I voice the sentiments on this side of the House when I say that we regard ourselves bound to give reasonable consideration and reconsideration to propositions put forward on behalf of Government against views which we may entertain. We have, on a former occasion, adopted an amendment of clause 33 which the Government claim to be unworkable. I have already said that though more than one speaker has denounced this Resolution as unworkable, we have not yet had any detailed description of how it would be unworkable. Nevertheless, speaking for myself, I accept the absolute good faith of the objection put forward to our Resolution by Government. It seems to me—and I think in this matter I voice the sentiments of those with whom I have agreed on this clause—that the object of both parties in this controversy is the same, namely, the securing of a fair trial. We do not want on this side to give undue favour and advantage over the prosecution to the accused; and I think—indeed it is my own conviction—that Government do not wish to give undue advantage over the accused to the prosecution. The object of both parties to the controversy being the same, it does seem to be anomalous that we should not be able to arrive at an agreement on this particular clause. We claim that the statements made to the Police by persons who afterwards come up as witnesses in support of a prosecution should be made known to the accused. It has been said, though not directly from the Treasury Benches, that one difficulty of the proposal which was accepted in this House with regard to this proviso will be to give accused persons access to everything, relevant to the case or irrelevant, and matter which it may be of great interest in the administration of justice to keep unpublished. Some suggestions have been put forward as to how an accused can be prevented from obtaining information of anything except that which is relevant to the accusation against him. But these are matters of detail. They require very careful working out. I quite accept what the Honourable Mr. Haigh said, namely, that the record made by an investigating officer should be complete and not abridged, or I think he used the word "cooked". But it does seem possible, if the proviso so far accepted by the House goes too far and creates difficulties in the way, not of the prosecution but of the administration of justice generally,—the public interest,—for some modified form of that proviso, acceptable to both parties, to be devised. I am not prepared with any amendment. The subject is too difficult and I think beyond my capacity. But so long as we are given this principle (in accordance with, as Dr. Gour pointed out, the principles underlying our law of evidence) that whatever a witness states immediately after an offence is committed should be open to comparison with what he may say when he comes into Court, so long as that principle is ensured and the relevant part of his statement is made public for treatment and comparison, we on this side will be satisfied. This is urged not merely in the interests of the accused. In the present law we allow the Court to aid itself with these statements. How many a prosecution has broken down because a witness is found by the Judge to have said at the investigation something different from what he said at the trial, and the Judge has not got before him any explanation from the witness, which, if he had been able to obtain it, might have entirely altered his view of the man's credibility. It is fair to the witness, it is fair to the prosecution, it is fair to the accused, it is fair to the Magistrate, that the true cause underlying the discrepancies in statements, e.g., either the original falsehood of the witness due to his desire to screen the accused or avoid trouble, or the subsequent falsehood of the witness, due to his desire to aid the prosecution—should be laid open to the light of day in order that truth and justice may prevail. The suggestion that I have to make is that if any amendment of this proviso can be made which will do away with the difficulties and dangers which the Government apprehend and still leave this one principle available, namely, that conflicting and contradictory statements shall be open to comparison and explanation, then it will be possible to reach an agreement on a matter that most certainly should be settled, if possible, in this House.

Mr. Harchandrai Vishindas: Sir, at the very outset, I must say that we accept the statement from the Government Benches that the remarks of Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith were not intended to be a threat. We may also accept the statement made by Mr. Tonkinson that the old Criminal Procedure Code of 1892 in its provisions in section 162 did not go to the length stated by Dr. Gour. But what we are concerned with is, not what the old law was, or what the law of 1898 was, but whether the law as it is now going to be proposed should be acceptable and is in the interests of justice or not. Therefore we should strip the controversy of all the verbiage with which it has been surrounded and confine our attention to the merits or demerits of the provision now under discussion. It will be sheer waste of time on my part to repeat the arguments that have been from time to time advanced in favour of accused having access to the statements made before the police, and also what has been said against it. But I would remind the House to be practical men and to confine themselves to the facts and truth of the case and not to be taken off their feet or dragged by their heels by somebody conjuring up visions of horror, or declaring that Government would become impossible, justice would be impossible and so on. They might as well state there might be a revolution or an earthquake. They must show that and not merely give their ipse dixit. Much stress has been laid by speaker after speaker on the Government side on the statement that there is a good deal in the police records which it would be entirely unnecessary for the accused to know and dangerous for the accused to know. Now I have been wondering in my own mind as to why this should be so, and speaking personally, after having 37 years' experience as a practitioner, I certainly have never come across a case in which the police statement contained anything which was irrelevant to the inquiry, nor have I heard from any other practitioners in my own part of the country, or in any other part of the country that police statements contain so many other things. And why should they? A policeman can be credited with at least as much sense as to know whether what the witness is saying is relevant to the inquiry and to the persons who are accused of the offence. If he is not sensible enough to know that, then he does not deserve to be appointed to his post. He must be chucked out at once. If he can be credited with doing his duty properly, he should confine the record only to what is relevant to the case. As Sir Henry Stanyon said, we have great faith in the bona fides of the Government but we want to point out to them that their fears and apprehensions are greatly exaggerated, and that in fact they will not exist. Mr. Haigh said, Oh, Mr. Rangachariar's proposal to give instructions to police officers who are recording statements would be impracticable and would lead to the cooking up of statements by the police officers. Why? I do not see the force of that argument at all. Policemen already have instructions from higher authority as to how they are to record their statements. Is it not now the practice that the police have certain challans and other forms in which they receive instructions from their superior officers as to how to record evidence, statements and so on, and how to keep their diaries? Well, there is nothing wrong and improper in the policeman being instructed to confine the record entirely to statements that are relevant to the inquiry. Now, no speaker from the Government side has challenged the propriety of the argument that if the statements recorded by the police are confined to relevant matter, in justice the accused person is entitled to have a copy of those statements. The objection that has come from the side of the Government is to matters that go beyond the case coming to the notice of the accused to the prejudice of the State and to the prejudice of other persons. As I have said, that is a very small matter, and with due deference to the Honourable Mr. Tonkinson, who says these things happen very frequently, I would say that his fears are imaginary, and such contingencies will not occur frequently. They would occur perhaps in one in a thousand cases. And you are not going to take account of exceptions; you are going to see what would lead to doing justice to the accused person as well as to the prosecution. As Sir Henry Stanyon has pointed out, in some cases the production of these statements might be very beneficial to the prosecution itself because it may appear that the witness whose statement is impeached by the defence pleader in the court, has said the same thing before the police, and the prosecution would receive help from that. They would point out that this man said the same thing before the police as he is saying now. So it is not in the interests of the accused person only but of the prosecution also to retain the clause. I said before that we should not conjure up visions of horror because of statements made by some speakers, but we should closely examine the merits and demerits and the facts of the situation. Therefore I submit, Sir, that there is not the slightest change of harm arising from the retention of this clause 33. I also said that the Government were perfectly justified in stating that they would adopt all the constitutional means in their power by going to the next Chamber. There was no threat in that; nothing improper in that, because they had to instruct their supporters that they should strongly vote on their side. But at the same time, I say that, whatever the Government may do constitutionally, so far as we Members of this Assembly are concerned, we find that the Government position in this particular matter is not sound but that our position is sound and that clause 33 should stand and should not be rejected.

Mr. B. C. Allen (Assam: Nominated Official): Sir, I am very reluctant to take up the time of the House even for two minutes in further discussing this much disputed clause. But Mr. Vishindas has asked a question to which I think an answer should be given. He has asked: Why do Government object to the clause as now amended? What objection is there to it? The answer is a very simple one. A police officer, when he goes into the interior to investigate a theft case, a dacoity case, a burglary case, records the evidence that is brought before him and frequently he finds that the statements of a witness give valuable evidence not only with regard to the case which he is investigating but also with regard to a number of cognate cases. For we all of us here know that in this country crime is frequently committed by gangs of criminals and that the detection of one crime leads to the detection of many. Now, if the clause as amended is passed into law, it would mean that the police officer, if he was compelled to prosecute the man he was originally pursuing before the detection of the other cases was completed, would be required, as soon as the accused was placed in the dock and as soon as he brought forward his witness, to make over to him a statement containing valuable information not only with regard to the case then under the consideration of the Magistrate but also the information enucleated to completely wreck his prospects of success in the various other linked and cognate cases. I hope, Sir, that the House will agree that this is so grave an objection that Government is justified in protesting against its being passed into law.

Mr. J. Chaudhuri (Chittagong and Rajshahi Divisions: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, much as I should have liked that some amicable settlement should have been arrived at with regard to this clause, I find that it is not possible. I suggested in the course of the discussion at an earlier stage that the word "may" might be used for "shall" so that the matter might be left to the discretion of the Court. Sir, my experience of Judges differs from the experience of some of my friends on my right who have a different experience of mofussil Magistrates. They say that Magistrates would interpret "may" absolutely arbitrarily. But, I believe, Judges with a judicial turn of mind would interpret "may" as almost "shall." Judges who have a keen sense of justice and responsibility interpret the discretion given to them as a discretion to be exercised in the interests of justice. That is the proper judicial temperament. But, as my friends say that Magistrates in the mofussil do not exercise their discretion in that way, of course, I cannot persuade them to accept what I suggested at that time. I do not, however, share the apprehensions that the Government Members do in this respect. Of course, I do not practise now, but from whatever limited practice I had in the courts, of old, I found that the police papers always came up with instructions. The defence got it somehow. So, what is now provided for in the section will only deprive the police of their illicit gain. But, in other respects, I wish to point out to the Government Benches that there are two diaries kept—one a general diary; in this the police Inspector, i.e., the Inspector in charge of the case, records the minutes of his visits to different places, his investigations and inquiries. Then there is another diary kept which is called the case diary or a special diary. In this he puts down the statements of persons he examines in that particular case. So I suggest that my Honourable friends in charge of the Bill need not go to the other Chamber to have this section amended and create any conflict with us—that would be very undesirable—when there is a more reasonable course open to them. What they need to do is that the executive should give instructions to the police officers to keep their diaries properly. That is, in the case diary they may enter the persons examined and in the general diary enter all miscellaneous matters with regard to their investigations, with regard to their suspicions, with regard to the persons suspected in this and other cognate cases. Thus if proper instructions are given, which it is the legitimate function of the Executive to give, to the police officers through the Inspectors General of Police in the provinces, they will avoid any failure of justice, or any prejudices so far as either the prosecution is concerned or the defence or third parties concerned. I, therefore, submit that there is no occasion for generating so much heat over this discussion, if the matter may be so easily settled by means of official and executive instructions to the police to keep their diaries properly.

The Honourable Mr. A. C. Chatterjee (Education Member): Sir, I am not a lawyer and I have not tried a case for the last ten years. I had nothing whatever to do with the framing of this Bill. And I confess that I had not taken much interest in the debates on this clause until this morning. But, Sir, I had a fairly large amount to do in the way of trying criminal cases during the first fifteen years of my service in districts which were considered fairly criminal and I have been very seriously impressed, after what I have listened to this morning, with the difficulties that Magistrates and the police in districts in the country will encounter if this clause as it has now been passed becomes law. My Honourable friend, Mr. Chaudhuri, has suggested that the difficulties will not be at all serious, that Government can give instructions to police officers to prepare their special diaries with special reference to this clause. I think, Sir, any such course would be fraught with the most serious dangers. My Honourable friend, Mr. Haigh, has already referred to these dangers. I do not know whether Honourable Members here have as much acquaintance with the ordinary sub-inspector of police as I have. As I have said, for fifteen years I was a Magistrate, either a District Magistrate or a subordinate Magistrate. For another five or six years I went about the villages in an entirely different capacity and I saw a good deal of the Magisterial and the police officers' work as an outsider. And I think, Sir, it would be most dangerous to give any instructions to the police to have these special diaries prepared in the way that the Honourable Mr. Chaudhuri and my friend, Mr. Harchandrai Vishindas, have suggested. I think it would be extremely unfair to the accused themselves if the police prepare their special diaries according to definite instructions given by the superior officers so as to exclude all matters which are not connected in a direct manner with the case in question. I think, Sir, that the Magistrate then will be prevented from having a true perspective of the entire investigation.

1 P.M. I think the Magistrate will be placed in an extremely difficult position. He will not be able to arrive at a correct conclusion as to whether the investigation was conducted in a proper and bona fide manner. The whole investigation, the whole proceedings as they will come before the Magistrate, will really be in a cooked form. In the interests of the accused themselves, Sir, I deprecate the amendment that has already been passed. I hope, Sir, that this appeal that I am making to the Members of this House will have some effect. I am not doing so as a member of Government. he has always been interested protecting the interests of the accused and in seeing that justice is done.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas (and some Honourable Members at the same time): I move, Sir, that the question be now put.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: The question is that clause 33, as amended, stand part of the Bill.

Mr. President: The question is that the clauses of the Bill be re-numbered in consecutive order.

The motion was adopted.

The Title was added to the Bill.

The Preamble was added to the Bill.

THE INDIAN OFFICIAL SECRETS BILL.

Mr. L. Graham (Legislative Department: Nominated Official): Sir, I rise to move:

"That the Report of the Select Committee on the Bill to assimilate the law in British India relating to official secrets to the law in force in the United Kingdom, be taken into consideration."

Sir, I have many reasons for craving the indulgence of this House, but I shall not trouble the House with many of those reasons. My first reason, Sir, is that I claim to be a new Member—may I say a very new Member—for I think it is unusual for a new Member to be entrusted with work of this importance in his first attendance in this House. The reason for this is, as you all know, the most regrettable illness of my Honourable Leader, Sir Malcolm Hailey.

Now, Sir, the Bill was, as you know, introduced some time ago in this House, and went, I may say, to a very representative Select Committee. That Select Committee performed its labours most conscientiously. I am in the happy position of testifying to the labours of the Select Committee because I was not a member of that Select Committee. The Report has been before the House for the last fourteen days or so, and certain amendments have been received. I do not propose to refer to those amendments in detail now. The Report I think is a full Report and there is no reason why I should make any lengthy speech now in moving that the Bill be taken into consideration.

Members probably would like to be reminded of the state of our law in this country at present. It is at present contained most inconveniently in the Indian Official Secrets Act, 1889, as subsequently amended by the Act of 1904. It is also contained in the English Official Secrets Act of 1911, and there is a provision in that Act which I think it would not be altogether superfluous if I should read it to the Members. That section runs as follows. (This was enacted in 1911, I may mention):

"If by any law made before or after the passing of this Act by the legislature, if any British possession provisions are made which appear to His Majesty to be of the like effect as those contained in this Act, His Majesty may, by Order in Council, suspend the operation within that British possession of this Act, or of any part thereof, so long as that law continues in force there, and no longer."

Now, Sir, possibly Members of this House may desire to have some reason why an English enactment should apply to India, an enactment relating to a matter in which we ourselves have legislated. The reason is this. Our Act of 1889 followed very closely the English Act of the same year or a year before. That Act was found insufficient in England and it was replaced by the Official Secrets Act, 1911. The secrets with which we are concerned are not only secrets affecting India or part of India; they are imperial secrets to a very large extent, and that is the reason, Sir, why legislation on this subject should either be contained within the four corners of one Act applicable throughout the Empire, or that legislation very closely approximating to that legislation should be in force. The Act of 1911 gives the option, "You take this Act or you frame a similar Act." You may ask why we have not remained content with the English Act. With the substance of this Act of 1911 we are content, but certain practical difficulties have arisen in the interpretation—not of the substance of this Act but in applying it to the Courts of this country. Our Courts have different names, our police officers have different names, and it would be convenient if the whole of our law should be expressed in what I may call an Indian form. To be added to that is the fact that the Official Secrets Act, 1911, was amended by the Official Secrets Act of 1920 in England, but the amending Act of 1920 does not apply proprio rigore in this country. The need of applying those provisions has been examined very carefully. They were introduced into the law in England as the direct result of experience gained during the Great War. As I have said, the need for reproducing the provisions of that Act in this country was examined. It was found that some provisions were not necessary; on the other hand it was held that some other provisions were necessary. This Bill, then, represents a combination of the laws in force in this country and in England and it has been, as I have said, very carefully examined by the Select Committee and I now move that the Bill, as amended by the Select Committee, be taken into consideration.

Dr. H. S. Gour (Nagpur Division: Non-Muhammadan): I have no doubt that the House will generally agree with me when I say that we all regret that the Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey, the Leader of the House, is absent to-day and was therefore unable to move the motion which has fallen to the lot of the Honourable Mr. Graham to move before this House. As regards his motion, Sir, we all recognise the desirability of having an enactment of the kind contemplated in this country. But I think it was said by the Honourable Mr. Innes on another occasion with regard to one of his Bills that it was not a slavish imitation of the English statute. May I borrow those words in this connection and say, why is this enactment a slavish imitation of the English statute? I should have expected, Sir, that an enactment of this importance would be taken up by the Indian Legislature by dividing it into two parts, or indeed into two Acts. Honourable Members know that military secrets stand on a different footing from civil secrets and it would have been much more desirable if an Indian Act dealing purely with military secrets were enacted and another Act dealing with civil secrets were introduced. The admixture of military and civil offences in the same Act is apt to cause confusion. It has caused confusion in my mind and I have no doubt that that confusion will be shared by others.

Now, Sir, passing on to the specific provisions of this Act, Honourable Members will find that the real mischief which this enactment is intended to check is that no act should be done which might prove prejudicial to the safety or interests of the State. When this clause was debated in Parliament, Honourable Members there questioned Government as to what the meaning of the words 'interests of the State' is and how that question is to be decided in each case. It may be that an act is perfectly innocent and not prejudicial to the interests of the State but became afterwards so prejudicial to it and who is to be the judge, whether the act was prejudicial to the safety or interests of the State. Honourable Members will find that very loose expressions of the English statute have been reproduced in the Indian Act. It was a complaint judging from the debates in the two Houses of Parliament that these loose expressions were apt to be misunderstood. In England where all trials are held with the aid of the jury, the jurors as men of commonsense understand these sections as men in the street commonly do. They do not go into the technicalities of the question but decide from the broad standpoint of commonsense, but in this country where trials at present are held without the help of jurors, Magistrates and Judges are apt to examine too narrowly the provisions of the section and apply to them their legal mind, and say that if an offence comes within the purview of a section the accused cannot escape punishment. This is a point of view which I present to the House, especially in view of the fact that while all offences under the English statute are exclusively triable in a Court of Sessions, the offences not punishable with 14 years' imprisonment and mainly those punishable with two years' imprisonment are here made triable by a Magistrate of the first class. I understand, Sir, that in response to my amendment on the subject asking the Government that all offences under this Act should be triable by the Court of Sessions, at any rate in cases in which the accused so desires, members of the Treasury Benches are willing to accept the amendment and concede that offences under this Act might be tried by the Court of Sessions if the accused so desires. I congratulate the Government upon accepting this amendment which would effect a great improvement upon the Bill as presented to the House. There are two or three other matters upon which I invite the attention of the Honourable occupants of the Treasury Benches and ask them to examine the provisions of the Bill and see if improvements cannot be made. If Honourable Members will turn to section 3, they will find that while in clause 1 the offence of spying is generally defined, clause 2 of that section lays down a special rule of evidence at variance with the existing law. Those of my learned friends who have studied the Indian Evidence Act will bear me out that evidence about character is wholly inadmissible in a criminal case, and I therefore invite the attention of the House to the fact that section 3 provides that if on a prosecution for an offence under this section, it is proved from his known character that his purpose was prejudicial to the safety or interests of the State he will be deemed to have committed an offence under this section. I suggest, Sir, that the Government might re-classify these offences, sub-divide the Act into Part I—Military, and Part II—Civil, and re-define the offences in less vague and more popular terms so that the people may know what they are to avoid and for which they are liable to be made punishable. The very general and loose expressions of the Parliament statute which have been reproduced in this Bill are not likely to be understood by the public at large to whom this statute is addressed, and I suggest, Sir, that it would certainly be in keeping with the policy of the Indian Legislature if expressions commonly understood and popularly known are used in preference to the expressions common in Parliamentary statutes. The various improvements which Honourable Members of this House have suggested will no doubt come up for consideration seriatim and I therefore do not wish to anticipate the authors of the amendments. I rest content by saying that I am not enamoured either with the draft or with the arrangement of the Bill and I can only regret that this Bill is a slavish copy of the Parliamentary Statute.

The Assembly then adjourned for Lunch till Half Past Two of the Clock.

MESSAGES FROM THE COUNCIL OF STATE.

Mr. President: Secretary will read two Messages from the Council of State.

Secretary of the Assembly: The first Message runs as follows :

" I am directed to inform you that the Bill further to amend and to consolidate the law relating to the provision of house-accommodation for military officers in cantonments, which was passed by the Legislative Assembly at its meeting of the 30th January, 1923, was passed by the Council of State at its meeting of the 14th February, with the following amendment :

' In sub-clause (2) of clause 21 of the Bill, after the words ' District Magistrate ', the words ' on requisition in writing signed by the Chairman of the Committee ' were inserted.'

' The Council of State requests the concurrence of the Legislative Assembly in the amendment '."

The second Message runs as follows :

" I am directed to inform you that the Council of State has, at its meeting of the 14th February, 1923, agreed without any amendments to the Bill to provide for the restriction and control of the transport of cotton in certain circumstances, which was passed by the Legislative Assembly at its meeting held on the 30th January, 1923.

THE INDIAN OFFICIAL SECRETS BILL.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri (Central Provinces Hindi Divisions: Non-Muhammadan). Sir, I beg to move that the Bill be re-committed to the Select Committee.

Sir, there is no one in the House who is not at one with the Government in their desire to suppress spying in this country. Spying even in its minor form is objected to even in private conversations between private individuals, and it is much more necessary that, where the interests of the State are concerned, where national defence is concerned, where spying would cause a real danger and disaster to the country, spying should be suppressed with a very strong hand; and I would have given my full support to the Bill if proper safeguards had been provided to save the innocent from being brought into the clutches of the law as laid down in this Bill. The language of the Bill is very wide and capable of much abuse in its interpretation. The phraseology is very peculiar and complex, so much so that, just as Dr. Gour observed a few minutes ago, in the House of Lords Lord Birkenhead had to say that he was not enamoured of the phraseology of the Bill. I will just give certain instances in the Bill which will show how dangerous and how capable of wide interpretation certain clauses in this Bill are. This Bill, as drafted, has a peculiar construction in this way, that it does not define at one place all the definitions that should have been defined at the beginning of the Code. Many definitions that are embodied in the Bill involve the definitions of the particular words used therein, and it would be very difficult for a lay man and a man of ordinary intelligence not versed in law, to interpret the terms properly. Sir, if I take you through the definition of spying, through the definition of a work of defence, you will find a word 'mine' used therein. I realize that the word 'mine' used in this connection is meant for the receptacle containing the explosives, etc., to protect the coasts from intrusion of foreign ships or men-of-war. But the word is also capable of interpretation in another way. Honourable Members who have read the papers of the last few days may have realized that even editors of papers have fallen into the common error of interpreting the word "mine" to mean excavations for digging out metals or minerals. I wish that the members of the Committee had cleared the meaning of the word as it was meant in this Bill. Going further ahead, Sir, Honourable Members will find 'spying' defined in section 3 as an offence. It is:

"Any person for any purpose prejudicial to the safety or interests of the State approaches or enters—and so forth—any prohibited place;"

"Any person for any purpose prejudicial to the safety or interests of the State makes any sketch, plan, model or note. . . ."

of what? It has been stated. This clause (b) is not governed by the words "prohibited place" which appear in clause (a). Clause (b) goes on further to say:

"makes any sketch, plan, model or note which is calculated to be or might be or is intended to be directly or indirectly useful to an enemy."

Now what does this come to—"any person who makes any note which might be indirectly useful to an enemy"—this does not say at what time it is likely to be useful. It may be useful 20 years later, who knows.

Mr. President: The Honourable Member is arguing a question of detail which will necessarily arise when we come to discuss clause 3. He must offer more general and substantial reasons for a motion to re-commit. He will understand that clause 3 will be open for amendment in order to satisfy the criticisms which he is now bringing forward, but it is a violation of the spirit of the Standing Orders to use the motion for re-committal merely for matters of detail. If he brings forward arguments such as those adduced by Dr. Gour they will be valid.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: I simply wanted to point out that there are certain matters in the Bill which are not capable of any improvement on the floor of the House, and with that object I am giving illustrations to show that they could not be improved on the floor of the House. I was simply showing how various expressions are capable of several interpretations in the hands of lay persons. That was my object, Sir.

As I have said, a note made by any person which might be such as to be useful to an enemy some years after might be regarded as spying. Consider the difficulties that will arise. There are census reports of places, there are Government statistics, historical records and maps of many places like Asoka's pillar, the Diwan-i-Khas, the Diwan-i-Am in Delhi and the

Fort in Agra. Any person having these things in his possession or publishing these things might at some time or other when a foreign power was evilly-minded enough to make war against our Government be utilized by that foreign power for its own purposes. And if we allow such interpretations to be put on these phrases I think many innocent persons are likely to be hauled up under this Act. Similarly, Sir, what is meant by the safety or the interests of the State? It has not been defined anywhere as to what will be the interests of the State. If you take the dictionary meaning, that will come to anything that is beneficial to the State. Supposing a thing is done and it does not agree with the opinions, or say with the political opinions, of certain parties, that may be regarded as not being beneficial to the State. The question of taking away any political powers from the Government even though in a constitutional way may also be regarded at some time or other as not beneficial to the State. I do not mean to say that this would be the exact interpretation of this expression in the Bill, but I am simply pointing out the interpretation that might be put on this clause. This would lead to much difficulty and much abuse and harassment to innocent persons. I wish the authors of the Bill had given the definition of these clauses at the very beginning of the Bill in clause 2 just as they have done with respect to some expressions. Further they have introduced a novel procedure of presumptions. Any person if he is suspected, mind you suspected, of having a communication with a foreign agent, if he happens to give an impression of his dealing with a foreign agent even unknown, it will be considered as spying. How dangerous will that be, Sir? It is quite all right in theory and in the book. But if you were to take the interpretations that have been given to "communication with foreign agent," you will find that the provisions are very wide and dangerous. What is the communication to a foreign agent? Communication to a foreign agent as defined may be when any person has visited the place of a person suspected to be a foreign agent. Suspected by whom? Not by the man who visits him. His knowledge is made quite immaterial but suspected by the Court; so far it is quite all right; but how is a man to know that the address that he is visiting, is that of a foreign agent? Not only that, Sir. If this man happens to possess any paper or any address of an agent or of any person who is suspected to be a foreign agent, this man is done for. If he has got any historical records or historical statistics or any other railway map that might be of some use at some future time, that man is liable to be hauled up. He will be deemed to have communicated with that man. Now, Sir, even if a foreign agent or a suspected foreign agent has a place of business in British India and if any other man whose known character as proved may cause a suspicion, in the minds of the judges, even innocently happens to go to the place of business of the former to deal in business only such a man will also be presumed to have communicated with a foreign agent. Such are the provisions in this Bill. Further, there is also a provision in this Bill as it has come from the Select Committee that if any person were to publish any information relating to anything used or relating to anything in a place, which is declared to be a prohibited place, that man will be deemed to have committed an offence under this Act; and forts at Agra, Delhi and other places may be deemed to have been prohibited places and the Frontier Province may also be deemed to be a prohibited place. If I were to draw the attention of the Government, speaking in this Chamber, that it is not desirable to maintain an army

Mr. President: The Honourable Member's arguments would be perfectly in order in considering each clause.

[Mr. President.]

I must point out to the Assembly, however, that supposing this motion were passed, there would be no indication whatever to the Select Committee what this Assembly expected them to do. The words in Standing Order 43 are "that the Bill as reported by the Select Committee be re-committed either:

- (i) without limitation, or
- (ii) with respect to particular clauses," and so on.

The words "without limitation" must be held to presume that this House is dissatisfied with the manner in which the Select Committee has treated the measure which was referred to it. A proposal to re-commit without limitation must necessarily refer either to the work of the Select Committee as a whole, or to some matter of principle on which the Assembly desires an opinion from the Select Committee and on which the Committee did not pronounce. If the Honourable Member is dissatisfied with the proposals made by the Select Committee on particular points—provided they are points of real importance in the sense of raising a principle—then he ought to move a motion under Standing Order 44 (b) (ii) or (iii), and not move, as he has done, to re-commit without limitation. If we were to pass this motion, the Select Committee would meet again and say: "We are satisfied that we did give reasonable consideration to the proposals of the Bill and we are of opinion that no further consideration on our part would lead us to alter the report before the Assembly." We should then be no further on.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, it is exactly with this object that I am pointing out these things because I want the Select Committee to know what is the point we want them to clear up. We want them to know that the wording used in this Bill is not proper . . .

Mr. President: That is not what the Honourable Member has done. The Honourable Member simply moves that the Bill be re-committed, and invites the Select Committee to re-examine the whole Bill without reference to any particular clause or any particular amendment. The Select Committee, with a mere general instruction before them, will sit down and they will say: "We are satisfied that we carried out the original intention of the Assembly; we examined the Bill in detail; the report we have submitted is a satisfactory report and represents our opinion."

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: All right, Sir, I bow to your ruling. I will simply say the wording used is very general and will cover even innocent dealings of innocent persons, and the substantive law and law of evidence have been jumbled up in the clauses and therefore it is necessary that the wordings be changed. It may be said, Sir, that the wording in this Act has been taken from the English Acts of 1911 and 1920, and been considerably improved by the Select Committee. My submission to that would be, Sir, that as they found that an improvement in certain directions on the wording of the English Acts was necessary, it may further be regarded as necessary further to improve the wording of this Bill to include certain definitions. It might be said, just as it was said in the English Houses of Parliament, that the Act will not be used in ordinary cases; that it will be used only in extraordinary circumstances of spying and when a gross breach of the law is committed. But one cannot be sure if it will be like that in this country. Act III of 1818 was enacted for a different purpose and continued up to this date, or rather to last year; it remained as a dead Act in the Statute Book but some of its provisions were used in 1906 or 1909. We do not want, therefore, that an Act should remain 8 P.M. on the Statute Book and hang like a sword of Damocles over our heads to be utilised at any future time, and it is necessary that the Select Committee should change the wording, clear up the expressions and bring it to a line where it may be acceptable to all of us. The language should be simple and easily understood even by "the man in the street." With these words, Sir, I commend my motion to the House for the re-committal of this Bill to the Select Committee.

Mr. J. Chaudhuri (Chittagong and Rajshahi Divisions: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, I oppose this motion. I shall for the present only answer very briefly the objection taken by my Honourable friend, Dr. Gour, and Mr. Agnihotri. Dr. Gour takes the objection that we have slavishly followed the English Act. We have done nothing of the kind. We have reduced the maximum sentence, which in the English Act ranges from minimum 3 to 14 years. For non-military offences we have fixed the maximum at 3, in some cases 2 years and fixed no limit to minimum and given the option of fine. We have classified offences into two classes—minor and major offences, what are called civil offences and offences of a military character. And we have introduced the nomenclature of the Criminal Procedure Code and described them as cognizable and non-cognizable and bailable and non-bailable offences. We have also introduced the nomenclature of our Evidence Act, such as relevant facts, presumption and provided for their rebuttal by evidence. So, as far as these go, I hope Dr. Gour will be satisfied that we have not slavishly followed the Parliamentary Statute but have recast that Statute on the lines of our law of Criminal Procedure and the Law of Evidence.

Now, something has been said about our using the words "safety and interest of the State." I do not wish to go into the details. We shall have every opportunity, when we discuss the clause, to go into the details, but I shall generally point out that we have classified offences into two classes—offences in the nature of spying military secrets and with regard to these we have used the words "safety or interest of the State." I suppose my friend would not contend that we should wait till the spy has done the mischief. It is when he is trying to pry into military secrets, is it not to the interests of the State to arrest him and put him on his trial before a Magistrate or a Judge? But here I shall just draw attention to where we use the word "safety" alone. We may refer to clause 5 (b) which reads: "Use the information in his possession for the benefit of any foreign power or any other manner prejudicial to the safety of the State." This in clause 5 relates to officers communicating information to foreign powers. If they so communicate it and if such communication endangers the safety of the State, then we proceed against him. The persons who are interested are the officers of the State who are in charge of these secrets. If they communicate to others and that endangers the safety of the State, no body will contend that they should not be found guilty of a breach of duty. Here the criterion we put down is rather high and that is that if this communication of the secrets is such as is likely to endanger the safety of the State, then they will be prosecuted and punished. But, with regard to military secrets and secrets palpably of a much more serious nature, we have used the words "safety or interest of the State." Supposing our military defences, mine-fields or mines are being noted or made sketches of by a spy. Before he has noted, obtained a sketch or communicated, ought not we to provide for his detection, for his arrest and for safeguarding the "interests of the State"? If he has taken these away, then he has completed the mischief. But it would, surely, be to the "interest of the State" that we should make provision for safeguarding its interests before it is too late. Even my friend Mr. Agnihotri used the word "interest" in his speech. He said that spies should be put down. He said that he is not in sympathy with them and that spies should be put down "in the interests of the State." So, when he was putting his own case before this House, he himself used the same expression and thus gave away his own case. I do not wish to detain the House any longer, but when we examine the amendments clause by clause, the House will be satisfied that we have made this Bill absolutely innocuous with regard to persons who may act bona fide. As regards the serious offences of persons who try to abstract military secrets or secrets relating to defence which are prejudicial to the "safety or interest of the State," nobody in this House will have the hardihood to say that they deserve any sympathy. For these reasons, Sir, I say that my friend Mr. Agnihotri has made out no case for re-commitment of this Bill to the Committee. We have done our best and as you have very rightly observed, Sir, if the Bill is re-committed to us without any definite directions, we shall not know what to do with it. We would prefer to wait and see if there is any substance in the amendments proposed. I therefore suggest that the discussion of the Bill be proceeded with.

Mr. L. Graham: Sir, I apologise for making what may seem a perfectly superfluous speech, but I think there are one or two points to be made yet. The first is that the Select Committee did examine all the material which was put before it. It may be in the recollection of Members that this Bill was circulated. We examined all the opinions we received. We also took the proceedings in this House. I say, Sir, that we examined very carefully all the material which was put before us. If Mr. Agnihotri wants to take a particular attitude towards the Bill, I fail to understand why he did not express himself at an earlier stage of the proceedings. It is therefore not necessary to take up the points of detail which Mr. Agnihotri has mentioned. One more point, Sir, as to what Dr. Gour has said. He has accused us of slavishly following British drafting. Well, my Honourable friend, Mr. Rangachariar, was in the Chair, and I do not think it is likely that he would slavishly follow anybody.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar (Madras City: Non-Muhammadan Urban): I am not ashamed of slavishly following the English of Englishmen.

Mr. L. Graham: That again is a point which I should like to take. The drafting of this Bill is important. Dr. Gour—whether he intended it or not—I trust he did intend it—paid a compliment to the work of the Legislative Department in saying that he would prefer this Bill drafted on the lines generally followed by the Legislative Department. He said it would have been clearer and more intelligible. Well, Sir, we acknowledge the compliment. But there is this difficulty. We intentionally followed the English form because of the provisions of section 11 of the Act of 1911. We felt that if we broke away from the form of the English Act and put up an Act which looked entirely different—and after all, the Act which Dr. Gour sketched for us would look entirely different—we should not be at all sure that His Majesty in Council would be prepared to suspend the English Act in favour of ours. Other points mentioned by Mr. Agnihotri, as you said, Sir, will be appropriately dealt with when he moves his amendments.

Mr. President: The original question was:

"That the Report of the Select Committee on the Bill to assimilate the law in British India relating to official secrets to the law in force in the United Kingdom be taken into consideration."

Since which an amendment has been moved:

"That the Bill as reported by the Select Committee be re-committed to the Select Committee."

The question is that the Bill be so re-committed.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. President: The question is:

"That the Report of the Select Committee on the Bill to assimilate the law in British India relating to official secrets to the law in force in the United Kingdom be taken into consideration."

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: It is suggested that it may be advisable to leave clause 1 for later consideration.

Mr. President: Clause 2.

Khan Bahadur Sarfaraz Hussain Khan (Tirhut Division: Muhammad): Sir, the amendment which I move is this:

"In clause 2 (7), after the word 'plate' insert the following:

'Provided these undeveloped plates on being developed are found to be the negatives of plates of prohibited places as defined under this Act'."

Here photograph includes an undeveloped film or plate, and in (9) we have:

"sketch" includes any photograph or other mode of representing any place or thing."

Under clause 3 the making of a sketch useful to an enemy is punishable. So, a man who has got photographs which include an undeveloped film can also be held up. Undeveloped films are plates in which the impression of the thing photographed is not visible. I am not a photographer, but I can say this much that unless an undeveloped plate is put in a solution the impression of that plate is not visible. For instance, take a man who stands in front of a place and takes a photograph and goes away. Then he is arrested and found in possession of that undeveloped film. Unless that film corresponds with the negative, I do not think he should be held up at all. So, in order to make it clear I provide this safeguard. It would be very unsafe to catch hold of the man or make him responsible when he is in possession of undeveloped films. In these circumstances, I beg to move my amendment.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: I move:

"In sub-clause (8) (a) of clause 2, the word 'mine' be omitted."

I would not have moved this amendment if the meaning of the word "mine" had been made clear in sub-clause (a). I am afraid that it is liable to misinterpretation and may be applied to the excavations wherefrom metals or minerals are taken out, though I think that "mine" means explosives used in time of war for defending the coast. If Honourable Members will see the last sentence of the sub-clause they will find the words "for the purpose of getting any metals or minerals". (A Voice: "In time of war".) I do not know whether the words "in time of war" govern all these sentences above. If they do, then the law would be perfect on that point. But if they do not, then it is liable to misinterpretation; and even taking for granted that it is to be prohibited in times of war, what will happen to the records, to the statistics and to the other papers and documents in the public libraries and other places in the bookstalls, and book-seller's places relating to a mine which be declared a prohibited place some years after the publication. If we go deep into the clauses we find that any person publishing any information relating to anything used in a prohibited place is liable to be brought under the clutches of this law and that would create difficulties and therefore I propose that the word "mine" should be deleted.

Mr. L. Graham: When this Act of 1920 was in the Bill stage before the House of Commons, a certain keen Parliamentary, Commander Kenworthy, moved that the word "mine" be omitted. His reason for doing so was that he was afraid that it might be misinterpreted. The Chairman of the Committee said "I really do not believe that anybody else besides the Honourable and Gallant Member would have understood that". Commander Kenworth, has his imitators. The Learned Attorney General was sympathetic and I should also like to be sympathetic to Mr. Agnihotri. What happened was this. The Attorney General said "there was no possibility of misunderstanding but, to meet your case, after the word 'mine' I propose to insert the word 'minefield', with these words so associated there is no possibility of misunderstanding." The House accepted the Attorney General's view and inserted the word "minefield." In our Bill, we have the word "minefield" after the word "mine". I submit it is impossible that there should be any misunderstanding at all. I would object to the removal of the word "mine" because it might be argued in court that one mine does not make a minefield. I therefore oppose the amendment.

Mr. President: The question is:

"That in sub-clause (8) (a) of clause 2, the word 'mine' be omitted."

The motion was negatived.

Mr. K. G. Neogy (Dacca Division: Non-Muhammadan Rural): I beg to move:

"That for the words 'an enemy' wherever they occur in clauses 2, 3 and 4, the words 'a foreign power' be substituted."

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar (Madras City: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Is every power an enemy?

Mr. K. G. Neogy: Every power is a potential enemy, and my Honourable friend, Mr. Bray, will bear me out when I say that. If Honourable Members will look into the provisions of clause 2, sub-clauses 8 (c) and (d), they will find that by the use of this expression it is intended to indicate the importance of the information which Government are anxious to safeguard. It will be seen that in sub-clause (c) of sub-clause (8) the information must be useful to an enemy, and a place may be declared to be a prohibited place when Government think that information with respect thereto will be useful to an enemy. So also in sub-clause (d). When we come to clause 3, we find that in sub-clause (b) likewise, any sketch, plan, model, etc., must be useful to an enemy. So also in sub-clause (c) any document, information, etc., must be useful to an enemy. The House ought to be quite clear on this point. We are not going to penalise the enemy, when we use this term in these clauses. We are merely setting a standard of importance of the secrets which Government must safeguard. That is the position. Now, it is well known that the expression 'enemy' in international law bears a particular significance; there is no room for any doubt as to what the word 'enemy' in international law would mean,—a State actually at war with the Crown. And we find that while the Act of 1911 was being considered in the House of Lords, a noble Lord raised the question as to whether when there was no war, that is to say, in times of peace, if a prosecution was sought to be launched under this Act, anybody could raise a defence saying that as there was no war, the State could have no enemy. Later on, we find that a case actually came up in 1913 in which this very point was taken. Honourable Members will find a reference to this case in Roscoe's Criminal Evidence, and there it was held that the term 'an enemy' as used in the Official Secrets Act was not confined to a State actually at war with the Crown. It does not say to what extent this term might be stretched for the purposes of this Act. So this leaves things rather in an uncertain state. Now, Sir, we find that the term 'enemy' has been variously used in certain special enactments where it has been given various meanings; for instance, take the Trading with the Enemy Act and other war enactments. Then again take the Army Act. In the Army Act this term is defined as including all armed mutineers, armed rebels, armed rioters and pirates. This matter is further complicated by reason of the use of this term 'enemy' in certain Treaties of the British Government with some Native States. I may remind the House that a reference to this particular question, namely, the terms of the treaties, was made not long ago in the Council of State in connection with the Princes' Protection Bill. I find that in at least 20 treaties which the British Government have entered into with the Native States

Mr. Denys Bray (Foreign Secretary): I rise to a point of order. Is the Honourable Member referring to Indian States?

Mr. K. O. Neogy: Yes, Sir, my intention was to refer to the possible difficulties that might arise. If the Honourable Members will turn to those Treaties, they will find that it is laid down, in at least twenty of them, that "the friends and enemies of one shall be the friends and enemies of both." Now, Sir, as is well known, the Indian States have no international relations at all. Therefore, it cannot be said that this expression in the Treaties can be given the same meaning as it bears in international law. Men like myself, who are uninitiated in the mysteries of diplomacy and diplomatic language, used to think that this clause of the Treaties constitute an offensive and defensive alliance between the British Government and the Native States for military purposes. But, Sir, in connection with the Princes' Protection Bill it was made clear that it was not so; and the Honourable Mr. Thompson read into this clause of the Treaties an obligation on the part of the Government of India to provide a measure for the purpose of protecting the Princes from hostile criticisms in the Press. And that interpretation has been accepted by the high legal authority of the present Governor General. Now, Sir, that being the case, I am apprehensive as to what interpretation this term may be given in the future. Will this term "enemy" include the enemies of the Native States, because it is said the enemies of the Native States will be considered the enemies of the British Government? But in that case enemies would include private individuals, and it would not be interpreted in the sense in which it is used in international law and in the sense in which it is used in the English law from which we have taken this term. Therefore, Sir, in order to be on the safe side I have proposed the substitution of the words "a foreign power" for the words "an enemy" in this clause. The reason why I have chosen the expression "foreign power" is that, though the expression used in the Act of 1911 was "enemy," in the Act of 1920 the expression used is "a foreign power." Honourable Members will find that in two places in clause 5 of the Bill the expression used is "any foreign power" and not "enemy." Therefore, Sir, I think that in every sense the Bill will be improved if we accept this amendment. That would give us a uniform phraseology, and the term will not be liable to misinterpretation in the way I have pointed out. I beg to move my amendment.

Mr. President: Amendment moved is:

"For the words 'an enemy' wherever they occur in clause 2 the words 'a foreign power' be substituted."

Mr. L. Graham: Sir, while admiring the erudition and labour which my Honourable friend, Mr. Neogy, has expended on this subject, I regret very much that I am unable to accept his amendment. I too have searched the Law Reports and have found a ruling as to the meaning of the word "enemy" as used in the Official Secrets Act of 1911. The word, Sir, means a potential enemy. Now, Sir, I think that, that on the whole helps to clear the ground. There can be no misunderstanding. An enemy of the State, when you come to examine the matter. . . . I take it, Sir, that we are dealing with clauses 3 and 4 as well as clause 2?

Mr. President: The Honourable Member actually moved his amendment to clauses 2, 3 and 4, but I have only been able to put the amendment to clause 2, because clauses 3 and 4 have not yet been reached. I do not object to the Honourable Member arguing his case with reference to all three clauses.

Mr. K. C. Neogy: Sir, I formally moved this amendment in regard to clause 2.

Mr. President: Yes. I put it in regard to clause 2 assuming that when we reach clauses 3 and 4, the Honourable Member's amendments will be treated as formal motions.

Mr. L. Graham: The reason why I asked that question, Sir, is because it is really impossible to separate the arguments and I had no wish to be pulled up in the middle of my stride.

With regard to clause 2 (8), sub-clauses (c) and (d), the position is that actually these notifications will not issue except in time of war. Works which are to be prohibited places at all times are those which are specified in sub-clause (a). Now war, Sir, is war whether it is civil war or war with a foreign power. In time of war it is equally necessary to protect buildings from being spied upon, whether by a foreigner or by the enemy within our gates. If you accept the amendment proposed by Mr. Neogy its effect will be that an enemy of our own nationality will be able to enter into these prohibited places because to him they will not be prohibited. The only person who will be barred will be the foreigner. The consequence, I take it, will be that the foreigner will employ a traitor—I am afraid I must say a traitor—to enter the prohibited place because he will be able to do it with immunity. Now, Sir, as I say, it is really part of my argument, and I therefore gratefully accept your offer to allow me to speak and to show how the change in the words would affect clause 3. There are, as my friend, Mr. Neogy, said, foreign powers and foreign powers. There are foreign powers which are great and there are foreign powers which are small. May I mention one very small power, namely, the Principality of Monaco and another, the republic of San Marino. Again, there are various little States in South America. Would it not be placing an impossible burden on a Court of Justice to have to come to a conclusion whether certain information, certain sketches, are calculated to be directly or indirectly or might be or are intended to be useful to a foreign power when there is no common standard of foreign power? It might be said: "This will be of no real advantage to Monaco; you have got only half a dozen soldiers there." The position, therefore, is that the Courts would be paralysed. The same remark, Sir, applies to clause 4. I, therefore, in this connection, ask that the amendment to clause 2 be rejected.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"For the words 'an enemy' wherever they occur in clause 2, the words 'a foreign power' be substituted."

The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was negatived.

Clause 2 was added to the Bill.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"For the words 'an enemy' wherever they occur in clause 3, the words 'a foreign power' be substituted."

The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, I move:

"In sub-clause (1) of clause 3 omit the words 'or interests'."

Sir, I admit it to be my misfortune that I could not be satisfied by the very illuminating arguments adduced by my friend from Bengal relating to the definition of the words "or interests". Sir, in this country the interests of the public cannot always be identical with the interests of the State in all matters. They may be identical in certain matters but they may not be identical in many matters. It may also happen, Sir, that even the interests of the public and the interests of the State may clash. There may be certain matters that may be prejudicial to the interests of the State, while they may be beneficial to the public. The meaning of the words 'the interests of the State' are vague. Take, for instance, the last Gaya Congress. It passed a Resolution, a very undesirable Resolution and I may call it a senseless Resolution to do away with their liabilities for international debts, or public debts that the Government of India might incur in future.

[Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri.]

Now, this Resolution on the part of those people will certainly not be for the benefit of the State or in the interests of the State. If any person were to make a report of that proceedings and publish it, he might be liable under sub-clause (c) of clause 1. He may be liable for this, because other nations that may be inimically inclined towards our Government might infer that the Indian subjects are not satisfied with their Government, and have repudiated the public debts, that there is a dissension between the subjects themselves and probably the Government may be a weak one; and if they enter into a war on that inference it will certainly come within the definition of the interests of the State. I do not mean to say that the interests of the State really includes such a case as I have just given and it may not have been meant to include such cases, but there is nothing to prevent interpretation in that way. Then, for instance, social disorders, religious dissensions between different parties, they are surely always prejudicial to the interests of the State. If anybody were to publish this information, and if that information might be useful to some foreign powers at some unknown time, the person who gives or publishes such information would be covered by this definition in clause 3 (1); I do not think that the Select Committee meant that this clause should cover such cases. Therefore, Sir, I think, that it would be better that "the interests" should be defined, but as that is not possible now it is better that the words should be omitted. On going further into the Bill we find that in certain clauses the words "or interests" before "the State" have been deleted. I do not know what led the Honourable Members of the Select Committee to include those words "or interests" in these clauses while at the same time they deleted them in other clauses that referred to civil affairs. If the meaning of the words "or interests" was clear in the case of civil affairs, it should equally be clear in military matters. If you drop it in one place, there does not seem to be any necessity to keep it in another. It only creates ambiguity and vagueness. Therefore I submit that these words "or interests" be omitted.

Mr. President: The amendment moved is:

"That in sub-clause (1) of clause 3 omit the words 'or interests'."

Mr. L. Graham: Sir, my learned friend, Mr. Chaudhuri, has referred to this question already. The point is this. These words were not included, as Mr. Agnihotri suggested, by the Select Committee in this clause. They were excluded in another clause, clause 6, for reasons which I will deal with later. Clause 3 deals with all the most important offences under the Act and it is not a new idea. It has been the law of this land since 1911, and you may possibly like to be told what occurred in Parliament when my Honourable friend's exemplar Commander Kenworthy moved a precisely similar amendment to omit the words "or interests." On that occasion Sir G. Hewart said:

"As to the objection raised to the words 'or interests', the answer is that they are taken from the Act of 1911, which says, 'purpose prejudicial to the safety or interests of the State'. It is obvious that certain matters cannot be said without exaggeration to imperil the safety of the State, but they go sufficiently far in that direction to be prejudicial to the interests of the State. Therefore those who were responsible for the Act of 1911 put in 'safety or interests'. We did not invent that phrase. We are simply carrying on the vocabulary of the 1911 Act, and if we were to leave out the words 'or interests' in the amending Bill, it would make it possible to found a legal argument upon the fact that the phrase was in the principal Act but not in the amending Bill, and it might be said that while the mischief that was aimed at by the principal Act included purposes prejudicial to the safety or interests of the State, yet, in order to come within the amending Bill, you would have to find something prejudicial to the actual safety of the State."

Well, Sir, as I said, we are dealing with the very gravest offences in this clause. In the other clause, clause 6, with which I will deal later, we deal with comparatively minor offences many of which are already covered by the existing penal law. The position is this. If you restrict the words and only use the word "safety" it is a very difficult thing to say about any particular act that it imperils the safety of the State but, if you let pass a number of such acts, the aggregate of these acts, not each one of which imperils the safety of the State, will imperil the safety of the State, and I ask you, Sir, is it right that the Empire should crash before we can get a conviction under this Act?

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Sir, I may perhaps explain to my Honourable friend, Mr. Agnihotri, why we retained the words "interest of the State" here and omitted them in clause 6 and elsewhere. If Congress volunteers were uniform and went about, it might be argued that they were doing a thing against the interest of the State. That is the thing which I had in mind when I advocated the dropping of the words "interest of the State" there. Nobody can argue it is against the safety of the State that Congress volunteers should go about dressed like ordinary volunteers. It is to avoid such a case that we dropped the words "interest of the State" in this and other sections. But here, in section 3, we are concerned with spies. In the case of spies it will be very difficult to draw the line between safety of the State and interest of the State. And "interest of the State" is not such an unknown term that my Honourable friends should have any apprehension about the use of that term. Why we are familiar with that term in the Indian Evidence Act. If you turn to section 125 and other sections, you find "public interest". A man may claim that he cannot disclose a secret, it is in the public interest that he should not disclose it. Has anybody ever felt any doubt as to what is meant by "public interest"? It is no doubt easy to conjure up doubts when you are here but you must credit the Court with some common sense and having regard to the facts of the case, there really will be no difficulty in coming to a conclusion as to what will be in the interest of the State and what will not be in the interest of the State. Therefore, in cases like these, where you have to deal with the real enemies of the country, I don't see any distinction between the enemies of the country and the enemies of the State, because if he is an enemy of the State, he is also an enemy of the people. (An Honourable Member: "Not necessarily.") Well, that is a point of view. I did not say enemy of the Bureaucracy, I said enemy of the Government. No people can exist without a Government. Government and the people make the State. So that, in such cases, where you have to deal with spies, I don't think we should show any leniency at all, for, if we are to get on at all in this country, we must safeguard our safety in the first place against foreign aggression or internal aggression which might overthrow the Government. I think we are all anxious to preserve a Government so that we may develop in it. I think, Sir, the words are necessary there.

Colonel Sir Henry Stanyon (United Provinces: European): Sir, I do not know that I altogether followed the argument of the Honourable Mover of this amendment. He drew an illustration, or what I thought to be an illustration; then he passed a sponge over it and said it was not an illustration. So far, at all events, I am sure, that he contemplated some sort of difference between the interests of the State and the interests of the people who form that State, which he called the public interest. Apparently he read the word "State" as if it is synonymous with the word "Government". I do not think that in an enactment of this kind that would be a correct interpretation of the word "State". I think the word "State" here must be read to cover widely all the community—its Government, its institutions, its public and everybody concerned who go to make up what we call the State. It will be impossible for us to legislate upon any supposed antagonism between the State and the people constituting that State; and upon that ground alone I think that this amendment does not deserve the support of the House.

The amendment was negatived.

Khan Bahadur Sarfaraz Hussain Khan: Sir, the amendment which I move is as follows:

"In clause 3 (1) before the words 'imprisonment for' insert the word 'simple' and make consequential amendments in other clauses."

Sir, it is not that I wish to make a provision making rigorous imprisonment simple. My point is simply this. The real object of sending people to jail in these cases is to keep them out of the way and not to let them have any communication with the enemy, and in these cases simple imprisonment will be quite sufficient. There seems to be no reason why simple imprisonment should not be sufficient. The words used in the clause are "he shall be punishable with imprisonment". It does not say whether it is simple or rigorous imprisonment. My object is to make it simple imprisonment. This object is served by putting the man in jail and thereby not letting him have any communication with the outside world. With these words, Sir, I move my amendment.

The amendment was negatived.

Khan Bahadur Sarfaraz Hussain Khan: There is another amendment. Sir, I put my view of the case. My amendment runs:

"In clause 3 (1) omit all words after the words 'to any secret official code, to' in the last but one line and in their place substitute the following:

'a maximum period of 14 years according to the gravity of the offence proved in the Court'."

The clause simply says "and in other cases to three years". I wish to simplify the whole matter and put it in black and white that the matter should be left to the discretion of the Magistrate trying the case and that the punishment should be according to the gravity of the offence.

The amendment was negatived.

Dr. H. S. Gour: Sir, the amendment I desire to move deals with clause (3). Honourable Members will find that this clause lays down a special rule of evidence taken from the English Statute. When this clause was under discussion in the Lords, Lord Alverstone, the late Lord Chief Justice of England, animadverted upon it in the following terms. He said:

"I would call his attention first to the words 'known character as proved' in sub-section (2) of clause (1). It is opening the door of criminal law for which some justification will be required. It is quite true that when people are found in certain circumstances, their previous record as actually proved can, under the Prevention of Crimes Act, be given in evidence; but I have never known any Act to go so far as to say that a man's known character may be proved, and I am afraid that in the working of the Bill this will create difficulties. I think the words will be found too wide unless some indication is given."

Honourable Members will observe these are weighty words, coming as they do from the occupant of the highest judicial bench in England barring only one. Now, if you read clause 3 as it is drafted and is proposed to be enacted—I leave out the unnecessary words—I shall only coin an illustration to show how it leads to a reductio ad absurdum. If Honourable Members will follow the words which I have underlined, they will at once come to the illustration which I am about to give them. The section says in clause (2) "any information relating to any prohibited place communicated by any person shall be presumed to have been made or communicated for a purpose prejudicial to the safety or interests of the State. Any information relating to a prohibited place, communicated, shall be presumed to have been communicated for a purpose prejudicial to the safety or interests of the State." Let me translate this into a concrete illustration. A says to B, "Look at this. Avoid going to this place. It is a prohibited place." That is an information relating to a prohibited place. It shall be presumed under this Act to have been communicated "for a purpose prejudicial to the safety or interests of the State". (A Voice: "No, no.") My illustration arouses the hilarity of the learned occupants of the Treasury Benches. That is my best vindication for the argument that I am addressing to this House. The whole thing, the whole language of section 3 is so diffuse, loose and verbose that it might include any act, however innocent, within the purview of that section. Now, Sir, I do not wish to weary this House by dealing with the general aspect of this question. I shall rest content if the House will support my short amendment which I am perfectly certain he who runs can understand. It is this. I wish to delete from the provisions of this section these most obnoxious words "or his known character as proved."

The Honourable Mr. A. C. Chatterjee (Education Member): May I rise to a point of order? Is Dr. Gour moving the first part of his amendment or the second part?

Mr. President: I understand the Honourable Member is not moving the first part.

Dr. H. S. Gour: I think you understood me rightly and my Honourable friend, Mr. Chatterjee, understood me wrongly. What is the meaning of the words, "his known character as proved"? I pointed out that in England the words "his known character as proved" were pronounced by the late Chief Justice of England to be a loose expression and too wide. This special rule of evidence provided in England has the least justification in this country. Honourable Members will observe that in England they have no codified law of evidence. Such rules of evidence as exist are culled out of decided cases, but in this country we have a codified law of evidence and it contains the definition of such a phrase—"when a fact may be deemed to have been proved"—and it lays down that a fact may be deemed to be proved when taking all circumstances into consideration the court regards it as proved and the ensuing sections of the Evidence Act lay down certain rules of relevancy and admission and other rules for the exclusion of evidence, and one of these is that in criminal cases the character of a man is not relevant. Now, this special provision made in a highly technical but nevertheless heinous offence of including a man's character as a piece of evidence upon which he might be convicted is, I submit, opposed to the law of evidence and is otherwise opposed to the ordinary principles of natural justice. What is a man's character? After all, if Honourable Members will pause for a moment and reflect, they will find that character means nothing more and nothing less than the opinion which one man has about another. Is a man to be convicted upon the opinions of people? And as this character is to be proved by the prosecutor I presume the evidence will be the evidence of the police and of a few witnesses whom they call for the purpose of establishing a man's character. Do Honourable Members in this House sanction such a procedure? I am perfectly certain they will do nothing of the kind. Prove your case by all means. The Evidence Act provides the mode and the manner of such proof. I am prepared also to allow the proof to be completed by the special rule of evidence which you propose to enact in this clause, but I certainly think that these words "known character as proved" must be deleted from this clause. It is likely, I submit, to lead to miscarriage of justice. If there is evidence of a man's bad character, we have also to give evidence of a man's good character. There will be a conflict of opinions. A few witnesses come up and say "This man is a badmash". A few men come up on the other side and say "We have never known a man of a more saintly character". Apart from the proof which this section requires and for which, I submit, the provisions of the Indian Evidence Act are amply sufficient, if they are not sufficient you have enlarged those provisions in this clause to the extent which I am prepared to accept, but I submit the House will not accept if coupled with the phrase "known character as proved" and if they are not

4 P.M. sufficient, you may enlarge those provisions in this clause to an extent which I am prepared to accept, but I submit the House should not accept if they are coupled with this phrase "his known character as proved". Sir, I move that these words be deleted from the clause.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"In sub-clause (2) of clause 3, the words 'or his known character as proved' wherever they occur be omitted."

Mr. L. Graham: Sir, my learned friend, Dr. Gour, took for his text in the first instance certain remarks of Lord Alverstone. Now before dealing with those remarks in particular, I would like to put it to the House that we have in the Select Committee very much reduced the scope of this clause. Previously that clause could have been used in the trial of any person for any offence under clause 3. We have, as has been noted before, re-drafted clause 3 so as to give a maximum penalty of 14 years for certain offences and a maximum penalty of 3 years for other offences. We only propose to rely on this special provision in the case of those very serious offences which are punishable with imprisonment for 14 years, that is to say, Sir, we shall be dealing with spies, an elusive and slippery race about whom the police have information, know a great deal, but that information would be summed up as information about pursuits and character generally. Now, Sir, what happens is this. I do not propose to be an expert in the ways of spying, and therefore I may be allowed, I trust, to quote the words of no less a jurist than Lord Haldane. Before I do so, however, I should like to remind the House that these words first appeared in the Act of 1911, that is to say, they were passed by a Liberal Government. Lord Haldane in introducing the Bill in the House of Lords, or rather in moving the second reading, stated as follows:

"The main change which the Bill makes is a change of procedure. In order to convict any one under the Official Secrets Act, 1899, it is necessary to prove the purpose of wrongfully obtaining information. If the man is found in the middle of fortifications, he may have strayed there by accident by night. You have to prove that he was there for the purpose of wrongfully obtaining information, and that has to be proved. This Bill adopts a method for which there is a precedent and which is much more effective."

That is, in certain cases persons are liable to conviction under that Act unless they can give a satisfactory account of themselves when they are found in certain places. Now to illustrate the difficulties with which we have to cope, let me again quote Lord Haldane:

"I will give one or two instances showing what the difficulties have been. Not many months ago we found in the middle of the fortifications of Dover an intelligent stranger who explained his presence by saying that he was there to hear the singing of birds. He gave the explanation rather hastily as it was midwinter. Then there was another case in which somebody was looking at the emplacement of guns in a battery at Lough Foye and he declared that he was there for the purpose of calling on somebody."

There was another case in which a man was found sketching a fortification. The details are not worth reporting, but they could not get a conviction. Now, Sir, as I have said, we are dealing with people who are committing most serious offences, and in order to prove their purpose it is essential that we should be able to give evidence of their character. It has got to be a sort of madness that would make the man likely to do something which was prejudicial to the safety or interest of the State. It would not be enough to prove that he was a very unpleasant fellow or that he beat his wife or anything of that sort, but it must be proved that he is the sort of person likely to do something dangerous, something prejudicial to the safety or interests of the State. He is not going to be tried or convicted unless he is found in extremely suspicious circumstances doing something which he ought not to be doing; and this Act provides that certain inferences may be drawn from the circumstances in which he was found and anything known about him before. I submit, Sir, that in these particular cases, where the necessity for the protection of the interests of the State arises and in which its safety is concerned, this is a justifiable provision. As I have said before, it was inserted by a Liberal Government and it was continued and applied to another set of offences by the Act of 1920 in England. I have quoted already no less an authority than Lord Haldane and I should like to conclude by quoting no less an authority than a late Attorney General, then Sir Rufus Isaacs, who said that it was a very difficult thing to administer the old Act and it is essential to have this provision, the whole provision.

Mr. K. C. Neogy: Sir, I will be very brief in referring to this amendment because Dr. Gour has said almost all that could possibly be said on this question. I would draw the attention of the House to the seriousness of the offence that clause 3 seeks to create. It will be seen that this offence is made punishable with imprisonment up to 14 years. What are the elements of this offence? A man does something. That is the first element, as enumerated in clauses (a), (b) and (c), and then his purpose in doing that particular thing must be prejudicial to the safety or interests of the State. Now, Sir, let us look at sub-clause (a). What is the act that he commits? He approaches, inspects, passes over or is in the vicinity of or enters any prohibited place. And what is a prohibited place? A prohibited place includes not only works of defence but any dockyard, factory or ship belonging to His Majesty. So, it is quite obvious that it is possible for a man quite innocently to either approach or to be found in the vicinity of any such factory or dockyard belonging to the State. Therefore, the essence of the offence is his purpose, which must be found to be prejudicial to the safety or interests of the State. This being the most important element of the offence, let us see what procedure is going to be adopted to prove it. It will be enough if you adduce evidence of his known character for the purpose of establishing this important element in the offence. That is a serious danger to which I draw the attention of the House. This danger was as a matter of fact admitted by the Select Committee in so far as it made a distinction between a military and a non-military offence. I must admit that that distinction has improved the Bill; but Sir, so long as Government is unable to justify this distinction in principle I am unable to be a party to the passing of sub-clause (2). It will be said that sub-clause (2) finds a place in the Act of 1911 which already applies to India.

That does not affect my opinion in the least. We are here to pass legislation which we consider to be in the best interests of the country. If Parliament has passed an obnoxious measure of legislation which we consider to be unsuited to the conditions in India, we must, while we are considering a measure seeking to re-enact that provision, establish by our vote here that we do not approve of such a provision. Now, Sir, my principal objection is that the chances of mis-interpretation of this clause are much greater in India than in England. My Honourable friend, Mr. Graham, has said "Oh, there are circumstances in which people may be found in very suspicious surroundings and then you cannot really establish with reference to specific acts on his part that his purpose was really prejudicial to the safety or interests of the State." That is exactly the danger which I am very much afraid of. Who knows that this provision may not give temptation to the authorities at one time or other to run in political suspects, or those who are in the opinion of Government political suspects, or non-co-operators for the matter of that, who may be found in the vicinity of a prohibited place? (A Voice 'No.') . . . Who says no? Is my Honourable friend, Mr. Chandhuri in a position to assure me that it will not be so? Is the Honourable gentleman in a position to give me that assurance on behalf of Government? Now, Sir, unless there is a specific guarantee that Government are not going to abuse this provision for the purpose of harassing their political opponents, I cannot be a party to this measure at all.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

" Clause 3. In sub-clause (2) omit the words 'or his known character as proved'."

The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was negatived.

Clause 3 was added to the Bill.

Mr. President: Clause 4 Amendment moved:

"For the words 'an enemy' wherever they occur, the words 'a foreign power' be substituted."

The motion was negatived.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, I beg to move:

"That clause 4 be omitted."

Sir, my reason for the omission is this: We have just provided in clause 3, by throwing out the amendment of Dr. Gour that a man may be convicted notwithstanding that he may not have committed any act, if from his known character as proved it appears that his purpose was a purpose prejudicial to the safety or interests of the State. Now, under this clause 4, you are providing that the fact of any person communicating or attempting to communicate with a foreign agent shall be a relevant evidence for conviction under clause 3. If we retain this clause, the result will be that this evidence, in addition to the evidence of a bad character as proved, will make a man liable to be convicted under the Act. Now, communication with a foreign agent certainly is a very serious thing. Communication with a foreign agent has been defined in this clause. What is it? "A person shall be deemed to have communicated with a foreign agent if he visited the address of the foreign agent or consorted or associated with the foreign agent." That is, if he visits a foreign agent, it shall be deemed that he had a communication with a foreign agent. Further, if he has been found in possession of any address of a foreign agent, whether it is in this country or outside this country, he shall be deemed to have communicated with a foreign agent. Now, it may just happen that the man visiting a place may not know that the place was the address of a foreign agent. If a man visits the address of a foreign agent he is deemed to have communicated with a foreign agent. Now, what is the meaning of address? "Address" in this clause has been defined to be "a place where he carries on business." A suspected foreign agent, if he carries on business at a particular place and any person who is a political internee or a non-co-operator, whose characters these days are believed to be prejudicial to the interests of the State, were to go to the place of business of a person suspected of being a foreign agent, then this non-co-operator or political internee shall be liable to be convicted under clause 3, and this will be very dangerous, because that political internee or non-co-operator may himself be innocent. Unless we have any proof of any overt act on his part, it will be rather dangerous and unjustifiable to convict that man simply because he happened to be a non-co-operator or a political convict or internee, and visited a place which happens to be a place of business of any person who is suspected to be a foreign agent. He may be an innocent person and, as such, he will be put to unnecessary hardship. Therefore, Sir, I propose that the whole clause 4 which makes the evidence relevant for conviction, where it is coupled with the proof of bad character, of a man, should be deleted.

Mr. L. Graham: Sir, I am somewhat surprised at the attitude of Mr. Agnihotri. He agreed that to communicate with a foreign agent is a thoroughly bad thing to do, the sort of thing a spy would do, and yet he proposes to omit this clause altogether.

The fact, Sir, is that this clause was inserted in the Act of 1920 as a result of our experiences at Home during the war. It was found that England was, I might almost say, honeycombed with foreign agents. Possibly the position is not yet so bad in India, but it might become so, and in fact, I think there is reason to suppose that it is likely to become so from a certain quarter. Now, in a case like this, it is absolutely necessary to be fore-armed. The reasons which impelled the Home Government to put in this provision were expressed by the present Lord Chief Justice, then Attorney-General, as follows: "After first drawing attention to the fact that nobody is going to prosecute a person for going to have tea with a foreign agent or even for sending him a postcard, he says that if he is found doing any of the extremely dangerous things which constitute the offence for which he is to be tried, then these facts may be used in evidence against him." I think the House which passed the second sub-clause of clause (3) will agree with me that they should pass clause (4) which is really on the same lines and is intended to meet the same necessity. I do not wish to deal with the matter in detail, but I would only like to read what Sir Gordon Hewart said:

"I hoped that what I said when I last spoke with reference to the opening and governing words of the second Clause of this Bill would have met in advance any such criticism as that which has just fallen from my Honourable friend the Member for Comsett. I am sure he sees that it is very important that this clause begins with words which limit its effect to proceedings in which a particular kind of offence is charged."

As I said, there is no prosecution under this section. It is simply an evidence section:

"In other words, the clause provides that where, for example, a man is found in Woolwich Arsenal and there is evidence to show that he is there for the purpose of spying, the further fact, if fact it be, that he has also been in communication with a German agent will be evidence that he has, for a purpose prejudicial to this country, obtained, or sought to obtain information calculated to be useful to an enemy."

Now, Sir, a foreign agent, it may be said, is to a spy what a jemmy is to a burglar; and as we have in our own criminal law a presumption about a man who is found in possession of house-breaking implements, so in respect of spies it is reasonable to expect that writing to foreign agents or communicating with them is a fact which he ought to be called on to explain and if he cannot explain it, it ought to count against him as proving that the act with which he has actually been charged was done with a purpose prejudicial to the safety or interests of the State.

Mr. K. C. Neogy: Sir, I have got one question to put to the Honourable Member who has just sat down; and that is, whether this provision has been incorporated in any legislation that the Colonies may have undertaken. The House will remember that this clause is taken, not from the Act of 1911 which applies to all British Possessions, but from the Act of 1920 which does not apply either to Canada, Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, Newfoundland or India. So far as I have been able to see, the Colonies have not brought in this provision by any legislation of their own. (If I am wrong, the Honourable Mr. Graham will correct me.) If that be so, what is the special urgency of this provision being incorporated in the Statute Book in India? I want to be satisfied on that point before I vote on this clause.

Mr. K. Ahmed (Rajshahi Division: Muhammadan Rural): May I ask another question, Sir, suppose there is a "Miladsharif" going on in the House of the Consul-General of Afghanistan or probably there is a general prayer, and as a Muhammadan, every Muhammadan must go there and say his prayers in the house of the Consul-General of Persia. Will that be a communication? Or suppose out of friendship the Consul-General pays a visit to a Member of the Legislative Assembly and he drops his visiting card and the Member of the Assembly returns the visit by dropping a visiting card of his, or probably in his diary he enters an entry that he dined with him on a certain day. Will that Member of this Assembly come under this section? If so, this would be an immoral law, it is a law which is illegal. I feel is an extraordinary thing that the people living in India will have to obey it, it is a law which is not only of a harsh nature but a law which a civilized nation should not have. Therefore, I expect my Honourable friend, Mr. Graham to satisfy the House how far its inclusion in sections 3 and 4 of this Bill is justified and how far it comes within the spirit of the law of this country.

Mr. L. Graham: May I say, Sir, that if a reply were permissible on an amendment, I would be able to satisfy Mr. Kabeer-ud-din.

Mr. K. C. Neogy: What about my question?

Mr. L. Graham: That will be dealt with in another quarter.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: There is a lot of misapprehension as regards the scope of the section. This section by itself does not create any offence. This section merely says what facts are relevant in a trial for an offence under section 3, it merely lays down the rules of evidence. Having regard to the peculiar nature of the case, the peculiar nature of the offence,—incidents which do not occur in ordinary human life do occur in such cases, insidious and underhand methods, and that is why a special legislation has to provide what special facts shall be relevant. If Honourable Members will notice, all that section 4 (1) says is, "shall be relevant" for the purpose of proving a particular fact, not that the Court is bound to draw the inference, not that it is conclusively proved, not even "shall be presumed"; it is merely relevant, it is a piece of evidence which the Court can admit in order to come to a conclusion whether the man has committed the crime or not. Honourable Members will remember that under section 3 it is essential for the prosecution to prove one or other of the three acts specified therein, that is, a person in order to be convicted, (a) must either have approached, inspected, etc., etc., any prohibited place; (b) he must have made a sketch, plan, model, etc., etc., which will be useful to an enemy; and (c) he must have obtained, collected, recorded, etc., etc., information which would be useful to an enemy (A Voice: "Might be"), might be, intended to be, or calculated to be (Mr. K. C. Neogy: "Directly or indirectly.") You have got to catch all sorts of cases so that the language should not be too narrow. Therefore these facts must be proved in the first place. In order to prove that fact, this will be one of the relevant facts taken into consideration. In order to find out whether this man has really communicated with an enemy, has really communicated an information to a foreign enemy, it would be relevant to know whether he is on visiting terms. If he is on visiting terms, that will be one of the facts proved. All that section 4 (1) says:

"In any proceedings against a person for an offence under section 3, the fact that he has been in communication with, or attempted to communicate with, a foreign agent whether within or without British India, shall be relevant for the purpose of proving" the commission of the offence. Therefore, it is merely a piece of evidence to which the Court may give such weight as it thinks fit taking into consideration the other circumstances which may be proved in the case. Then the latter portion is:

"For the purpose of this section, but without prejudice to the generality of the foregoing provision,—

(a) a person shall be presumed to have been in communication with a foreign agent if—" he has done all those things mentioned thereunder. That is, in order to prove that he has been in communication, the law lays down a presumption—a presumption which is rebuttable. That, my Honourable friend who has spoken against this section has forgotten. It is not a conclusive presumption. If you go merely and innocently for tea or if you merely go for the purpose of doing business in the business premises of a foreign agent, why it is the easiest thing to prove that you had a transaction to buy a horse or to buy some Persian carpet or do some other thing. It merely says 'shall be presumed.' In a case like this, in order to avoid difficulty, having regard to the delicate and serious nature of the offence, the law has to take care. It cannot be too careful and too cautious in such matters. Remember we are dealing with enemies of the State. When once you have that in mind, all these difficulties now help up which no doubt may appeal to unthinking people but to those of us who are here such argument is not convincing, it is very easy to catch popular or newspaper applause by holding forth and pointing out the dangers and pitfalls, but we as legislators have to be careful in dealing with legislation which deals with enemies of the State. You should not leave loopholes through which these fellows can escape. I have no mercy for them. I have no sympathy with them, however patriotic I may be and you must never be kind and leave a loophole for an enemy of the State to escape. Therefore you must catch them by all means even if you err. It does not matter if you err because prevention is better than cure in such a case. While I am at one with my Honourable friends that we should not encroach upon ordinary methods of proof, I recognize these are peculiar cases and peculiar cases have to be dealt with in a peculiar way and after all our Legislature is not committing any enormity. We are trying to follow the English people in all their political institutions and rights. If it is good for an Englishman, why should it not be good for us. True we have not got our own Government. That is the real secret of all this opposition. I quite admit that, but this is not the way to get rid of the foreign Government and establish our Government. In order to keep the State going you must have these measures in your armoury so as to deal with enemies of the State, not enemies of forms of Government. Now, I am an enemy of the present system of Government. I want to get rid of it and substitute Government by my countrymen. But this does not apply to me. It applies to the enemies of the State. My Honourable friend says he is not quite so sure, but I daresay that if he was on the Bench and I were appearing as Counsel for an accused person I would be able to satisfy him in no time that this is the intention of the Statute. After all, you must remember what the intention of the Statute is in a case like this. The courts are not there merely to go upon the literal meaning of the words. They will construe in a liberal spirit in favour of the accused and after all this is merely laying down what facts may be relevant and will carry weight, so that it is not conclusive proof at all and I therefore think that there is really no harm in retaining this section.

Dr. H. S. Gour: Sir, my friend on the right has accused the House and the Members thereof from suffering from a lot of misapprehension. Whatever may be the case with other Members, I have not the slightest doubt that my learned friend on the right has taken a lion's share of that misapprehension. He opened his speech and wound it up by saying 'We want to deal with the enemies of the State.' But, Sir, this section is not dealing with the enemies of the State. It is dealing with a piece of evidence and we are yet to find the enemies of the State. The question my friend has assumed, that we are dealing with enemies of the State, is mere claptrap: the whole question is, who are the enemies of the State. My friend told us, and he has repeated that statement, that we are dealing here with the enemies of the State, by which I presume he means that we are here dealing with foreign subjects. Let me warn the House that this Bill, if passed into law, shall equally apply to all British subjects, Indians, Europeans or foreigners. It applies to everybody, and it is not the case, as my Honourable friend has assumed, that it is intended to lay the enemies of the State by the heels. Even if it were so, are not the enemies of the State entitled to justice? Are they not entitled to fair trial? Are they to be convicted without any judicial evidence, without any formulated plans set out and proved against them? Are special chambers of horror to be devised for the purpose of impaling and pulverising foreign people? Surely, Sir, no Member in the House will endorse the pseudo-patriotic appeal which my Honourable friend on my right addressed to us. Let us, I say, be free from this cant, and address ourselves to the main question. Is the evidence, is the special rule of evidence which this section creates, is it warranted by the natural principles of equity and justice? That is a short question which I submit should engage the attention of this House. Let us be clear of those extremely vivid but at the same time misconceived notions of protection of the State and laying by the heel its enemies. We have neither the enemies of the State nor the protection of the State in view: in this section we have nothing but pure justice in view. Is it, I submit, consonant with the natural justice that with regard to a man who is found with a visiting card containing the address of a person or the person with whom he resided, that it should be a relevant factor? Turn to the section and you will find, Sir, another reductio ad absurdum: a person shall be presumed to have been in communication with a foreign agent—and I now leave out other words and select the words which suit my purpose, and it will show to you the absurdity of it, such a case is conceivable, and because the section lays down a large number of circumstances, and I am going to present you with one of them. If he has visited the address of a foreign agent, namely, any address—clause (c)—used for the receipt of communications,—(a person is charged with the offence under section 3); the evidence against him is given that he is presumed to have visited a foreign agent; the evidence given is that the foreign agent has an address. But 'address' is defined in clause (c) as a place where letters intended for that agent are received. Such a place might be a popular hotel or a large bank. As a matter of fact, Honourable Members know that when they tour about the country they generally have their letters addressed to a bank or a hotel. If therefore in such a place of common resort the foreign agent has left his address, a person shall be presumed to have been in communication—the accused shall be presumed to have been in communication with him if he has an address. If you have the address of that hotel or bank you shall be presumed to be in communication with a foreign agent. It is absolutely unnecessary to labour the point. These special rules of evidence were defended in the House of Commons by our present Viceroy, then the Attorney General . . . (A Voice: "No, you are mistaken.") . . . by Sir Gordon Hewart . . . (Mr. L. Graham: "I may say that you are again mistaken.") Yes, by Lord Hewart—then the Attorney General, but not upon the grounds to which my learned friend has adverted to in this House. I say, Sir, look at the section: look at its extreme danger: address yourself to its complete artificiality and its divorce from the ordinary rules of the law of evidence to which this country is subject, and I have no hesitation that you will discard this clause as wholly unnecessary and as calculated to do injustice in the trial of offences. I wish to warn Honourable Members that this clause might be used against any one of them. It is not a clause which is reserved, as my Honourable friend from the right has pointed out, only for the enemies of the State. It may be used against the most loyal citizen; it may be used for manufacturing enemies, as my friend, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar, aptly points out. It is therefore, I submit, open to be used as an engine of oppression, and it is on that ground that I ask the House to support this amendment.

Colonel Sir Henry Stanyon: Sir, with regard to the proposal to omit clause 4 of the Bill, in all humility I venture to support, with the strongest language at my command, the views put forward by my friend, Mr. Rangachariar; and, in the most friendly way, but again with the strongest language at my command, to refute the warning given to this House by my old friend, Dr. Gour. I would venture once more to draw the attention of the House to the fact that this is a legislation of a special kind. We are dealing in this legislation with an evil which is insidious beyond perhaps our imaginings: which works in the dark; and which can only be met with its own weapons. We are by this legislation giving powers to our judicial and executive authorities not to be misused, not to be abused, not to be applied as an engine of oppression, but to be kept in hand, just as we keep in hand all other defensive apparatus, to meet an evil which can only be met by special legislation of this kind. I do not suppose that any of us knows, or that we shall ever know, the extent to which the safety or the interests of the State were endangered and honeycombed with the evil of hostile spies and foreign agents during the last ten years. One argument raised against this clause is that it comes not from the Statute of 1911 but from the Statute of 1920. To my mind that is one of its strongest recommendations. It has behind it the experience gained during the late war—which broke out in 1914. As the Honourable Mr. Rangachariar has pointed out, this clause contains special rules of evidence. Take it away and you deprive this enactment of a very large part of its usefulness.

(At this stage Mr. President left the Chair, which was occupied by Sir Campbell Rhodes.)

Dr. Gour is quite right in saying that it does not apply only to one set or class or race of people, but that it applies impartially to everybody; that is so. It applies to everybody; but it operates only against those who, be they English or be they Indian, guilty of the offence of spying, are enemies of the State. The whole of this clause rests upon the foundation given in sub-clause (b), namely, the definition of a foreign agent. That is the first thing you have to get. You must have a foreign agent. If he is not there, then it does not matter what is done by any gentleman, whatever his political opinions may be for the time being; but when you have got a foreign agent, then you have a snake; and if the poison of this snake is not to be disseminated, as it always is, secretly, clandestinely, with every ruse and stratagem that the brain of man can devise, you must have some provision like this to prevent it from spreading. We must trust our Courts. Later on we shall come to the question of the standard of Courts which are to try cases under this enactment, and it will be seen at once that as a Legislature we are not going to entrust these powers to irresponsible or inexperienced or weak or stupid Magistrates, but to Courts which can be trusted to use them only in those very special circumstances, to meet which this enactment is devised. I would like, speaking for myself, to see this House not divided against itself, but strong in laying down, for the information of all concerned, that spying in India,—spying that is in a way prejudicial to the interests and safety of the State,—is going to have a very poor chance of success in this country.

Mr. T. E. Moir (Madras: Nominated Official): I move that the question be now put.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. Chairman: The question is to omit clause 4.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, I move part (b) of my amendment No. 12. I do not wish to move part (a):

"In clause 4, in sub-clause (2) (a) (i), after the words 'with a foreign agent,' insert the words 'having reasonable grounds for believing him to be a foreign agent'."

Sir, we have heard from the Honourable Mr. Rangachariar and the Honourable Sir Henry Stanyon that these laws are meant for offences of a special kind. Nobody ever doubted it and nobody ever questioned it. But the apprehensions and the fears we have are that the law as embodied in this Bill may be abused or misused and innocent persons may suffer, and it is with the object of safeguarding the innocent persons that this amendment is put forward. It was also said that the law to suppress spying should be as strict as possible. Nobody denies it. It was also said that the trial of such cases will not be entrusted to any weak or stupid Magistrates. Where is the guarantee for that? If the Government find that such and such a Magistrate is a weak Magistrate and such and such a Magistrate is a stupid Magistrate, they will not retain his services any longer. So long as the

[Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri.]

Magistrates are occupying the Bench, we are to assume that they are intelligent and strong Magistrates,—though they might commit errors of judgment, which might give us cause to infer their weakness or stupidity at certain times: And, if they could be guilty of such an error of judgment at one time, they could be no guarantee that they will not indulge in similar error at some other time. Here we provide, Sir, that, if a man were to visit the address of a foreign agent and if that man happens to be a person whose character as proved is such as to lead to a presumption that the act which he committed is prejudicial to the interests of the State, then that man will be liable for conviction under this Act. What would be the case? Take the case of the political internecine. What further evidence—for many of our Magistrates will there be necessary to prove that the man is not a bad character? If such a man were to visit a place which is suspected to be the address of a foreign agent and if such a person at the same time or thereafter goes or approaches any military station, or any military telegraph or telephone station that may be confined within a fort, he will surely be liable to be prosecuted under this Act. Take the case of Sitabardi Fort of Nagpur. The telephone or the wireless station in Sitabardi Fort of Nagpur may be considered to be a military station. If a political internecine or convict or a non-co-operator or seditionist happens to go near that fort, which happens to be close to the railway station

Mr. L. Graham: On a point of order, Sir. Is not the Honourable Member speaking on clause 3?

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: On clause 4, Sir, coupled with clause 3 and the definition of the 'prohibited place' as given in clause 2 (a), which combined, make a man liable for conviction under this Act. Now, Sir, if the place is a military station, or if it has a military telephone and telegraph, and if it happens to be near the railway station where passengers have to go and if it enters into the head of the Executive that a particularly undesirable man should be prosecuted, or should be locked up, then what is there to prevent such an executive from prosecuting that man and getting him punished under this Act? My Honourable friend said that these laws are special laws, they may not be abused, they are not capable of being abused. Have the Honourable Members of this House forgotten the instances given by my Honourable and learned friend, Mr. Rangachariar, himself, of the abuse of section 107 of the Criminal Procedure Code? Have my friends here forgotten the excesses committed by the police as given on the floor of this House? Have my friends forgotten the instances and the judicial experiences given by my Honourable friend, Sir Henry Stanyon

The Honourable Mr. A. O. Chatterjee: May I rise to a point of order, Sir? I understand that the Honourable Member is moving the amendment relating to sub-clause (b) under clause 4, and, so far, I have not heard the use of the word "foreign agent" in his speech. He is referring to the question of convictions which has already been dealt with in clause 3.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: I was just pointing out that the visit of a man to a foreign agent's address by itself may not be sufficient for conviction but that when it is coupled with certain other facts, there will be sufficient evidence for his conviction. I am pointing
5 P.M. out

Dr. H. S. Gour: What is relevant may be sufficient for conviction.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, what is relevant is often sufficient for conviction.

Dr. H. S. Gour: May be sufficient.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri : But in practice we see that it is more than sufficient and we will find that it is quite sufficient. We know that in theory it may be only relevant. Sir, I was pointing out, that when the simple provisions of the criminal law have been abused in the past, there could be no guarantee that such a drastic provision as is provided in this Bill may not work harshly against innocent persons. If we were to allow this sub-clause 2 (a) (1) of clause 4 to stand as it is, we make innocent persons unnecessarily liable under this Act in certain circumstances. Therefore as it is likely that innocent persons might suffer, I beg to propose that some safeguard should be provided to protect innocent persons from being made liable under this Act. Only those persons who have knowledge or have reason to believe that the person is a foreign agent, and knowing this if they happen to go to his place, then only should they be made liable under this Act. Therefore, Sir, I move my amendment. At the same time I would also like to say, that often when an amendment is put forward,—and there be some mistake in the amendment or when it does not fit in properly, Honourable Members on the Government Benches get up and say that the amendment has not been properly drafted, and take exception to the wording of the amendment which I think is not justified . . .

Mr. L. Graham: I might allay the apprehensions of the Honourable Member by saying that I think his amendment is admirably drafted.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri It may be. But supposing there was any mistake, in that case I should certainly have been happy to accept "knowingly," or "intentionally" or any other words that the Government may like to put in, in order to safeguard the interests of innocent persons. That is my chief object. If a person were innocently to go and visit the place of a foreign agent, he should not be made liable, and that evidence should not be used as relevant evidence against him.

Mr. Chairman: Amendment moved:

"In sub-clause 2 (a) (1) after the words 'with a foreign agent' insert the words 'having reasonable grounds for believing him to be a foreign agent'."

Mr. L. Graham: Sir, it is rather difficult to reply to Mr. Agnihotri in defence of the clause as it stands now, because what he has done is not to attack the clause as it stands now but to attack clause 3 which has already been passed by this House. I do not propose to start defending clause 3 which the House has already passed, but what I wish to point out is this. If you accept this amendment you will make it practically impossible for the evidence which is contemplated by this clause to be led at all. I take the position to be as follows: The man who is accused of an offence not under this clause but under clause 3 as you will remember, has been associating with a foreign agent. If Mr. Agnihotri's amendment is accepted, you will not be able to adduce that evidence that he has been associating with a foreign agent unless you can first satisfy the Court that the accused ought to have known that the person with whom he has associated was a foreign agent. I put it, Sir, that this is an impossible burden to throw upon the prosecution. Foreign agents do not display name boards in front of their residences with the words "foreign agent" inscribed in golden letters on it, and there is really no possible chance of satisfying the Court, that a foreign agent, being an unobserved and somewhat obscure person working in serpentine manners, is a person whom the accused ought to have known to be a foreign agent. It might be reasonable to require the prosecution to prove that an accused should have known anything which a person of reasonable intelligence would have known, but it is not fair to put on the prosecution the burden which this amendment would put on it. Therefore, Sir, I oppose this amendment.

The amendment was negatived.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: I move:

"In sub-clause (2) omit sub-clause (a) (ii)."

I need not say anything in defence of the omission of this sub-clause. Much has been said by Dr. Gour while moving the amendment about the omission of the whole clause 4. This sub-clause (ii) makes a man liable if he were to have only the address of any person who in the words of Mr. Graham does not declare himself to be a foreign agent and who is not expected to proclaim himself as a foreign agent as Mr. Graham has been pleased to say—still you want that innocent person to be made liable for this offence. He may be equally unaware that the man is a foreign agent, but if he happens to have his address either in a foreign country or in this country you make him liable. Therefore I move this amendment for omission of that sub-clause.

Mr. L. Graham: I think this is a forlorn hope of Mr. Agnihotri's. The House without a division has accepted the whole clause, and the small portion that Mr. Agnihotri wishes to take out is really a vital portion of this clause. I submit that any one who has voted against the omission of this clause as a whole must vote for retaining this portion of it. I would therefore oppose the amendment.

The amendment was negatived.

Mr. Harchandrai Vishindas (Sind: Non-Muhammadan Rural): May I interpose by suggesting that the House should adjourn now?

Dr. H. S. Gour: May I point out, Sir, that we have a very important Committee which is to meet immediately after the Assembly rises and of which I presume you are a Member. That Committee has been once adjourned and I do not think that it will be wise that that Committee should adjourn again. We have to transact a very important business and I would therefore request in view of the hour which is ten minutes past five, you might adjourn the House.

The Honourable Mr. A. C. Chatterjee: Sir, you and the House are aware of the congestion of public business in the House. Government are quite prepared to go on with this Bill. If we do not finish the Bill to-day or do not make satisfactory progress, our business will be put out of order. As you know, Sir, there is a lot of important work, in which the Members of the House are interested during the next few days and Government are quite prepared to go on. But if there is any strong feeling on the part, generally, of all Members of the House, we do not wish to press the question. We are prepared to leave it entirely to you. We should like to finish clause 4 if possible. We leave the decision to you.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: May I point out to you, Sir, that we have been sitting during these two days until 6 o'clock and even after 6 o'clock, and it upsets a great many arrangements which we have already made. The hours fixed are between 11 and 4, and I think it is in consonance with the general practice in these matters that if it has to sit later it should be only in exceptional cases and that care should be taken to see that the Members of the House are not inconvenienced. If you say that you are going to sit till 6 o'clock, proclaim it once for all so that we may know where we are. The announcement is that we are expected to sit between 11 and 4 and if you are going to sit after 5, it necessarily upsets all arrangements which Members of this House may have entered into previously. To-day happens to be one of those occasions when we are required in some other place and I therefore suggest to you,—of course you have the right to adjourn or not and the matter is entirely in your hands,—that we do adjourn as soon as this amendment is disposed of. (Voices: "The amendment has been disposed of.") Then we had better adjourn now.

Mr. L. Graham: Do I understand Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar to refer to the amendments to clause 4?

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: No.

Dr. H. S. Gour: We will require some time to consider it.

Mr. L. Graham: I should not like to say that Dr. Gour's amendments are not important. My point is this. We have defeated an amendment to omit the whole of clause 4 and we are now dealing with clause 4 piecemeal. I think it would be more satisfactory to finish clause 4.

Mr. Chairman: The only argument that has been advanced is Dr. Gour's—that there is important business for some Members which follows this sitting. I therefore adjourn the House till 11 o'clock to-morrow.

The Assembly then adjourned till Eleven of the Clock on Thursday, the 15th February, 1923.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.

Thursday, 15th February, 1923.

The Assembly met in the Assembly Chamber at Eleven of the Clock. Mr. President was in the Chair.

Mr. President: Members desiring to take their seats will advance to the table to take the oath or to affirm in the manner prescribed.

MEMBER SWORN:

Mr. Hubert Arthur Sams, C.I.E., M.L.A. (Director General of Posts and Telegraphs).

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

DUTIES OF INCOME-TAX COMMISSIONERS.

347. Beohar Raghubir Sinha: Will the Government be pleased to state the duties of Income-tax Commissioners and Assistant Commissioners?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: The Honourable Member is referred to paragraph 22 of the Income-tax Manual.

REPRESENTATION re STRINGENCY IN MONEY MARKET.

348. Mr. W. M. Hussanally: (a) Have the Government received any representation from the Bombay Indian Merchants' Chamber in regard to the stringency in the money market, and suggesting remedies as announced by the Associated Press in a telegram dated 27th January? If so, will the Government be pleased to place the same on the table?

(b) Will the Government be pleased to state what action they propose to take in the matter?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: (a) The representation referred to appeared in the Press; a copy is however laid on the table.

(b) Government are of course closely watching the money market. They are not prepared to make any statement at present on this subject which in any case does not lend itself to treatment by way of question and answer in this House.

Telegram, dated Bombay, the 27th January, 1923.

From—The Secretary, Indian Merchants' Chamber, Bombay,

To—The Secretary to the Government of India, Finance Department, Delhi.

Committee Indian Merchants' Chamber beg to draw attention of Government to the prevailing acute stringency in the money market and to the serious and chaotic condition of the present currency arrangements of the country and urge on them the necessity of immediately repealing the hasty legislation of 1920 in order to enable natural forces to operate freely on our exchange position.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: May I ask a supplementary question. Is Government prepared to give out whether it is their intention to make the sale of Council Bills more frequent than once in a week, or do Government think that they will keep the rate of exchange steady?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: The Government will be prepared to give the matter consideration, though I am not sure that it will provide a remedy.

INDIANS IN EUROPEAN COSTUME ON RAILWAYS.

349. Rai Bahadur Lachmi Prasad Sinha: (a) Will the Government be pleased to state whether Indians in European costumes can travel in Intermediate and Third class compartments reserved for Europeans or Anglo-Indians?

(b) If not, why not?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: The Honourable Member is referred to the answer given on the 8th February, 1923, in this Assembly to question No. 334, asked by him in a similar connection.

RAILWAY REVENUE EXPENDITURE.

350. Rai Bahadur G. C. Nag: Have any orders been issued to railway administrations to curtail programme revenue expenditure? If not, what steps have Government taken to assure themselves that the full amount of renewals as represented by the amounts of money shown in the answer given on 17th January, 1923 to starred question No. 164 as having been sanctioned for the East Indian and the Great Indian Peninsula Railways, shall be worked up to?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: The answer to the first part of the question is in the negative. The two railway administrations have been asked to push on with the renewals as much as possible.

RE-ORGANISATION OF RAILWAY DEPARTMENT.

351. Rai Bahadur G. C. Nag: With reference to item 6 of the statement at page 993 of the Legislative Assembly Debates, Volume III, do Government propose to give the Assembly an opportunity to discuss the proposed reorganisation of the Railway Department before the proposals are embodied in the Budget?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: The reply is in the negative.

UNSTARRED QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

ARRESTS IN N.-W. F. PROVINCE OF PERSONS CONNECTED WITH CONGRESS AND KHILAFAT AGITATION.

167. Mr. Ahmed Baksh: (1) Will the Government please state as to how many persons, if any, in the North-West Frontier Province have been arrested up to date in connection with the Congress and Khilafat agitation?

(2) How many persons have been after full trials sentenced to imprisonment and to what terms? And how many have been released?

(3) Will the Government be pleased to inform the House as to how many prisoners are serving in the jails for failure to give the security under section 40, Frontier Crimes Regulation, and how many under section 17 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act?

(4) Whether the convicts under section 40, Frontier Crimes Regulation, have invariably been sentenced to rigorous imprisonment or any of them have been sentenced to simple imprisonment also? Will the Government please also explain as to why this distinction was made, and if it was made on any particular principle, what is that principle?

(5) Are all or any of these above referred to convicts treated as political prisoners, and if not, why not?

KHILAFAT PRISONERS IN PESHAWAR JAIL.

168. Mr. Ahmed Baksh: (1) What was the number of Khilafat prisoners detained under section 40, Frontier Crimes Regulation, in Peshawar jail in May, 1922, and what is the number now? If there is any decrease, how has the same been caused?

(2) Whether or not it has been brought to notice of the Government that the authorities of Peshawar jail had forcibly snatched away the caps of a number of prisoners sentenced to simple imprisonment in connection with the Khilafat agitation, on account of there being crescents fixed on the same, if so, whether such action was justified under the Jail Manual or ordered by the executive Government of the North-West Frontier Province?

(3) Is it a fact that the other batch of Khilafat prisoners serving rigorous imprisonment were kept in solitary confinement for over one month at a time and fetters were put on them, if so, why?

CONVICT GHULAM RASUL KHAN OF SAFEDA.

169. Mr. Ahmed Baksh: Will the Government please state as to whether there is a convict of the name of Ghulam Rasul Khan, of Safeda, Mansehra tehsil in the Hazara district, now serving his term in the Peshawar jail for failure to deposit security under section 40, Frontier Crimes Regulation?

(a) If so, when and where was the security demanded from him?

(b) Where was he sentenced?

(c) What security was demanded? •

(d) Is it a fact that Rs. 5,000 cash and Rs. 5,000 personal security was demanded from him, if so, why such heavy security demanded?

(e) Is it a fact that he was already under security at the time of his arrest?

(f) If so, whether the previous security was forfeited, and if not, whether there was any justification for the demand of fresh security?

MARTIAL LAW IN MANSEHRA TEHSIL.

170. Mr. Ahmed Baksh: Do the Government know that Martial law was proclaimed in the Mansehra Tehsil in the year 1921? If so, whether His Excellency the Governor General accorded sanction to it, if not, under what authority was such step taken?

CONGRESS AND KHILAFAT AGITATION PRISONERS.

171. Mr. Ahmed Baksh: Is it intended at all to treat prisoners convicted in connection with the Congress and Khilafat agitation as political prisoners? If not, why not?

IMPRISONMENT OF ABDUL QAIYUM KHAN SWATHI AND MALIK KHUDA BAKSH.

172. Mr. Ahmed Baksh: Will the Government please state as to how many times since their conviction have Abdul Qaiyum Khan Swathi, B.A., of Hazara, and Malik Khuda Baksh, B.A., LL.B., late of the Bannu Bar, been sent to solitary and separate confinement and for what length of time were they respectively kept in any such confinement at a time?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: The information is being collected and will be supplied to the Honourable Member on receipt.

 THE CANTONMENTS (HOUSE-ACCOMMODATION) BILL.

Secretary of the Assembly: Sir, I beg to lay on the table the Bill further to amend and to consolidate the law relating to the provision of house-accommodation for military officers in cantonments as passed by the Legislative Assembly and amended by the Council of State.

 THE MARRIED WOMEN'S PROPERTY (AMENDMENT) BILL.

Mr. B. S. Kamat (Bombay Central Division: Non-Muhammadian Rural): Sir, I beg to move:

"That the Report of the Select Committee on the Bill further to amend the Married Women's Property Act, 1874, be taken into consideration."

On a former occasion, Sir, I explained the object of my Bill. For the information of some new Members I wish to recall what I said on the previous occasion. The object of this Bill is to remove certain doubts created by certain conflicting decisions of the three High Courts—Madras, Bombay and Calcutta. The Madras High Court has held that the Married Women's Property Act applies to Hindus, Muhammadans, Jains, etc. The other two High Courts, Bombay and Calcutta, have held that this Act does not apply to Hindus, Muhammadans, etc., with reference to policies of insurance taken out by husbands for the benefit of wives. My object is to remove this conflict of decisions with a view to give the benefit of section 6 of the Married Women's Property Act to the two communities which I have mentioned. Section 6 of the Married Women's Property Act says that a policy of insurance effected by any married man on his own life and expressed on the face of it to be for the benefit of his wife or of his wife and children or any of them shall enure and be deemed to be a trust for the benefit of his wife, or of his wife and children, or any of them, according to the interest so expressed, and shall not, so long as any object of the trust remains, be subject to the control of the husband or of his creditors or form part of his estate. If this section does not apply to Hindus, the disadvantage is that even in a case where the husband insures for the benefit of his wife, either his creditors or members of a joint Hindu family practically claim an interest in the insurance money, and the benefit of that insurance is taken away, so far as the wife is concerned. If, therefore, section 6 of the Married Women's Property Act is applied to insurance policies effected by Hindu husbands or Muhammadan husbands, I believe it would be to the benefit of the wife inasmuch as creditors or other members of a Hindu joint family will not be able to take away the benefit of the policy. That is the object I have in view. I am glad the Select Committee have reported in a way so as to support my object. The changes effected by the Select Committee are only two. As regards the first, I originally proposed to apply this section to Buddhists. The Select Committee has reported that it is not desirable in enacting this particular measure to include the Buddhists, as there are very few Buddhists in India, and, supposing the benefit of this is to be extended to Buddhists, the Government of Burma have said that they are willing in case of necessity to pass a measure of this kind in their local Council.

The second important change effected by the Select Committee is with reference to the question whether retrospective effect should be given by this Bill to policies of insurance already effected by certain people either in Madras or elsewhere. It was thought that it would not be desirable to give any retrospective effect inasmuch as people may have taken out policies on the understanding that they would be able to borrow money against the policies. Therefore the recommendation of the Select Committee now is that if at all this change in the law is to be made it should come into effect after April, 1923.

During the discussions of the Select Committee we have given careful consideration to the views and representations of Insurance Companies so far as the aspect of insurance is concerned. It was thought that the change in the law as proposed now might make certain classes of policies unpopular. After careful consideration the Select Committee came to the conclusion that if Insurance Companies properly explained the objects of this Bill to the proposers there would be no hardship and therefore there would be no disadvantage even from the insurance point of view in making the change. On the whole the Select Committee has supported this Bill; all the Local Governments are in favour of it; I believe that the Government of India are not against it, and I trust this House will support it. If it is carried I am sure it will be a great benefit and a great advantage so far as the Hindu, Muhammadan and Jain communities are concerned. I trust therefore that I shall get every support from this House for this Bill. Further, if it passes this House and if it passes also in another place, which I hope it will, I believe that this will be the first non-official Bill to go on the Statute Book under the new regime.

Mr. J. N. Mukherjee (Calcutta Suburbs: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Sir, under Standing Order 44, I beg to move that the Bill be re-committed to the Select Committee.

I am one, Sir, who is in agreement with the principle of the Bill, but to my mind there are certain very weighty considerations which seem to have been overlooked by the Select Committee. There is no doubt that the Married Women's Property Act, as appears from the Preamble and the opening sections of the Act itself, was intended for a certain class of persons who are not affected by the special doctrines of Hindu or Muhammadan law, or the general law, for the matter of that. The House will see that the Act now in force contemplates principally the persons in India who come under the operation of the Indian Succession Act. What the Married Women's

[Mr. J. N. Mukherjee.]

Property Act seems to secure for the benefit of a man's wife and children by way of insurance has been laid down by section 6 of the Act. It is to some extent something in lieu of a marriage settlement, a consideration as it were for the marriage, in many cases governed by the Indian Succession Act. Such cases have concern with the contractual forms of marriage, to a great extent. We are now trying by direct legislation to extend the principle of the existing Act to Hindus, Muhammadans and Jains. The intention of the Bill is no doubt a very good one, but at the same time we have to consider certain aspects of the matter which affect Hindus, Muhammadans and Jains in a special sense. Now, so far as Bengal is concerned, there may not be much difficulty; but as regards other parts of India very often the communities concerned are governed by the Mitakshara school of Hindu law. Under that school, very often the karta or manager of the joint family has dominion over the entire joint family property. Further, according to the Hindu law of the Mitakshara school, the sons are coparceners by birth with their fathers as well as with the other members of the joint family; they have a vested interest in the coparcenary property as soon as they are born and the property becomes the property not only of the father and the karta of the family, and of his sons, but of them and the other coparceners as well. So that, any special provision for the sons by way of insurance, by the father will have to be effected with joint family property. That is to say, a karta or the head of Hindu coparcenary property can by heavily insuring his life in favour of his wife and children very often do away with or segregate a portion of the joint family property for the special benefit of his wife and children. That is an aspect of the case, Sir, which seems to have been overlooked by the Select Committee. The Honourable Member of this Bill placed before the House the points which were really taken into consideration by the Select Committee and the report also refers to them. He did not mention, nor does the report itself mention, that these points were considered by the Select Committee. To my mind, Sir, they are questions of great importance. If a policy is effected by means of joint family property, the people affected have the right to know what the exact position should be of the benefits which are to arise out of that policy in relation to the claims of creditors and others. Then, Sir, it has been pointed out in some of the opinions elicited on the Bill that a Hindu—when insuring his life very often insures it with the idea that the policy is negotiable, so that during his life time he may have the benefit of the policy himself by being able to deposit it with the insurance office and raising money on it, and by otherwise assigning it. Whether upon the passing of the Bill the policy will still remain negotiable or it will have full effect as the Bill intends, that is to say, by imposing a sort of trust for the benefit of the wife and children is another question which requires careful consideration. At any rate, if the effect of this Bill, if passed into law, be that persons of this class will be deterred from insuring their lives for the benefit of wife and children and that they will thereby be deprived of their right of negotiating on the policy, it will perhaps have an effect opposite to what it aims at securing. That is to say, the object of the Bill being to benefit the wife and children of the person insuring his life, it will perhaps by that process have a deterrent effect, and the Bill will fail to achieve its own purpose. These are considerations, Sir, which lead me to think that more careful attention should be given to the Bill itself and these different aspects of the question should be considered in greater detail. The insurance companies have also raised certain objections and the House may also take into consideration whether we should insist upon a trustee being always named in such cases so far as Hindus, Muhammadans and Jains are concerned. I find, Sir, that Mr. Darcy Lindsay who represents the insurance interests in the question, has not signed the Select Committee's report and I regret I do not find him present here to-day. He would have been able to throw more light on this question, if he had been present here to-day, from the insurance point of view, that is to say, he could have stated, whether the Bill will have a discouraging effect on insurance business, if passed in the form in which it is now presented to the House. If greater facilities for insurance had been offered by the Bill and more detailed consideration been accorded to the subject, it would, instead of defeating its own purpose, perhaps help to secure the end it has in view. All these points,* I submit, Sir, the House may be pleased to take into consideration, and to re-commit the Bill to the Select Committee, specially because there is no haste in the matter. The country has done without the Bill so long. It does often suffer to my mind from hasty legislation; and the House should stop and consider whether it should now pass this Bill in its present form, which is foreign to the social organization of the classes contemplated by it, without more detailed consideration of the points indicated. We should not take away the existing system simply by considerations of haste and speedy legislation. With these observations, Sir, I move that the Bill be re-committed to the Select Committee.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar (Madras: Nominated Non-Official): Sir, I cannot help saying, with all deference, that the Honourable Member who has just spoken has not understood the scope of this Bill. Sir, the object of this Bill is to place Hindu widows in the same position as widows belonging to the Christian community. Under the Married Women's Property Act, section 6, if an insurance is effected in favour of wife and children, a trust is created and the insurer is thereby debarred from dealing with the insurance as if it were his own property, and his creditors after his death cannot attach it as if there has been no trust. That is the object of section 6 of the Married Women's Property Act. That benefit has been secured to Christian women and we want to secure it for Hindu women. That is the object of this Bill. That would not affect the questions which my Honourable friend has raised in the debate just now. My friend Mr. Subrahmanayam, for example, has some doubts of an analogous character and those doubts also will not in any way be solved or made worse by the provisions of this Bill. For example, Sir, supposing an individual out of joint family property pays premia and at the same time declares that the amount of the policy should go to the wife and children. Undoubtedly, if this Bill becomes law a trust will be created in favour of the wife and children. He himself cannot deal with it; his creditors cannot deal it. It would not defeat the rights of the joint family if the members of the joint family choose to claim it, because a man cannot be creating a trust of somebody else's property, defeat the rights of the true owner. Those rights will always remain intact. They will not in the least be affected by anything that he has done. Those rights will remain and continue to remain, notwithstanding anything that he may say or do. The object of this Act is to prevent the man himself from again borrowing a loan upon the insurance, to prevent his creditors after his death from attaching the property as if there has been no trust. These benefits are given to women of other communities and these benefits are intended to be secured by this Act to Hindu women. That is the only object of this Bill and I do not see how the considerations which have been put forward so elaborately by my Honourable friend arise at all in connection with this Bill. This is a simple Bill. I had intended, Sir, to bring in a Bill which was somewhat more ambitious, and if my Honourable friend had in mind the provisions of my Bill, probably he would be justified in making the remarks; but that Bill is not before the House. The short Bill before the House is to give Hindu women the same rights which are possessed by Christian women under the Married Women's Property Act. That is all, and without understanding that object of this Bill if criticism is directed towards showing that Hindu families will suffer, I think that would prolong the discussion and would result in no good whatsoever.

[Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar.]

There is one point which I want to put before you, Sir, and it is this. Undoubtedly the ruling would be from you, Sir, but I want to mention the point. Very often motions are made for re-committing a Bill to the Select Committee. If I may say so, it is only for acts of omission and commission by the Select Committee that you can ask that the Bill do go back to the Select Committee. If you object to the principle of the Bill, if you say that the Bill itself should be defeated, it must be on the floor of this House. All these points must be debated and you must vote against the Bill. What has the Select Committee done in this particular case? What are the acts of commission and omission which can be charged against the Select Committee and why should a motion for taking back the Bill to the Select Committee be made in the manner in which it has been made, Sir, I make these general observations, because very often we find that without adverting properly to the meaning of the motion of sending a Bill back to the Select Committee, these motions are made in this House; and my remarks, Sir, are intended generally for all motions of this kind. On this particular matter, Sir, my submission is, the remarks of the Honourable gentleman who spoke just now are beside the point altogether.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary (Calcutta: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Sir, I would be very unwilling to say anything that would retard the progress of what Mr. Kamat has rightly called the first non-official Bill ready for the consideration of this House. At the same time I do feel the difficulties that Mr. Mukherjee has raised. I am afraid, like him, I shall be charged with not understanding the scope of the Bill. Well, if Mr. Mukherjee and I did not sufficiently appreciate the scope of the Bill, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar has made the position quite clear. The Bill aims at placing the Hindu widow in the same position as her Muhammadan and Christian sister with regard to certain matters. So far it is undoubtedly a liberalising measure, and we should welcome all liberalising measures if they are a part of a well-considered organic whole. Fortunately or unfortunately it is difficult for us now to understand why the Hindu law-givers, with whom Dr. Gour, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar and many more would have no patience at this long distance of time did not choose to put the Hindu widow under same schools of Hindu law in the same position as her more fortunate sisters under other systems. Times are undoubtedly changing. Insurance policies are a thing which have come from the West, like the Law of Trust

Mr. J. Chaudhuri (Chittagong and Rajshahi Divisions: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Not known in Mr. Manu's time.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: Not known in Mr. Manu's time as Mr. Chaudhuri informs me. Mr. Manu was not a longheaded man. Any way it is there and we must reckon with it. Anyhow intricate questions arise if the insurance has been at the expense of the family, as it may well be, and often is. Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar would go so far as to say, better far, (Dr. Nand Lal will no doubt assert) better far pamper the already pampered profession of the law, augment the chance of family litigation; let the family fight out whether the trust is maintainable or not, let the creditor be kept at arm's length, but give the widow rights which according to some High Court she does not enjoy—Would this be right and desirable? Sir, in my early days, the Law of Trust used to be explained by some in a very short fashion as the Law of Distrust. It was supposed to be invented only to keep some people at arm's length. The King then was acting in a very untrustworthy fashion, and the lawyers of Great Britain evolved the Law of Trust. Supposing the creditor has to be kept at arm's length, which I understand from Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar is, not the sole, but one of the objects of the Bill, he would and could be so kept if the debt had not been incurred under terms sanctioned and contemplated by the particular school of law. If these terms were satisfied the property may be available for the satisfaction of that debt. There are complications which we cannot, however much we may desire, fail to take note of. The Hindu law of succession has its difficulties, judged by modern standards. We are not discussing that big question on its merits or demerits. And we cannot ignore these difficulties. There are sections of the community that think that what is proposed is a method of circumventing the wise or unwise provisions of the Hindu law that cannot appeal to the general body of people. It seems to me therefore that there is room for a little more careful consideration of the situation as a whole than has been bestowed on this Bill particularly when premia have been paid out of this Joint Estate. I for myself am not prepared to endorse the whole of Mr. Mukherjee's objections to the Bill because I do feel that in a proper manner and as a part of a well-considered organic whole, liberalising influences have to come into play. But whether we can take big questions piecemeal like this is what I am unable to understand. Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar has drawn your attention to the desirability or otherwise of moving for the Bill being put back to the Select Committee as a blocking measure, if I may put it shortly for him. Well that is a constitutional method open to Members and I do not see, if necessity arises and if a case is made out why the method should not be resorted to. For my purposes however there is in Mr. Mukherjee's proposal more than that. I would not consent to the Buddhist being excluded from the purview of the Bill for any of the reasons that have been put forward in the Report of the Select Committee. One reason is that there is no Buddhist Member present in this House. Well, Sir, communal representation is in the air; but it is carrying matters a great deal too far to say that because for the time being there does not happen to be a representative of a particular community present in the Assembly, is a reason why what is otherwise right and proper should not be done. The Government must have consulted Buddhist representatives, and their opinion must be before the Government. That is not all; the Burma Government, we are told, is prepared to have local laws with regard to the matter, but Burma has by no means the monopoly of Buddhist subjects of His Britannic Majesty. I come from a Province where there is a large Buddhist population who could not get the benefit, if it is a benefit, of the Burma Act. And, therefore, if the principle of the Bill is to be made applicable to Indians, I do not see why the Bengal Buddhists should be excluded. And there are Buddhists in other provinces, not to the same extent as in Bengal, that is one of the reasons why this matter should be reconsidered. I shall probably be told that, as was attempted in another matter not many days ago in this House, to effect a remedy in this direction by an amendment to bring the Buddhist within the purview of the law. Possibly that course was open; but the point of view that has been put forward by the Select Committee would be better considered even from the Burmese point of view, if the Bill went back to the Select Committee. For all these reasons, Sir, I think the motion for re-committal of the Bill is not as ill-conceived as Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar would suggest, and I support Mr. Mukherjee.

Rao Bahadur C. S. Subrahmanayam (Madras ceded Districts and Chittoor: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, I support this Bill in its entirety. The position is simply this. There is a section of the Married Women's Property Act of 1897 which I shall read, for it is necessary to understand what it is because many a Member here may not have had the opportunity to know its contents:

"A policy of insurance effected by any married man on his own life and expressed on the face of it to be for the benefit of his wife or of his wife and children or any of them, shall endure and be deemed to be a trust for the benefit of his wife, or of his wife and children, or any of them, according to the interest so expressed, and shall not, so long as any object of the trust remains, be subject to the control of the husband, or to his creditors, or form part of his estate."

That is the law as laid down by the Legislature. The question arises whether Hindus could take the benefit of this section. The High Courts have differed in their opinions of the Act. The High Courts differed in their opinion. The cause of difference was this. Section 2 says: "Nothing herein contained applies to any married woman who at the time of her marriage professes the Hindu, Muhammadan, Buddhist, Sikh or Jainia religion, or whose husband at the time of such marriage professes any of those religions." This section has been the subject of controversy between the various and even among Judges of the same High Court. It is unnecessary for me to enter into the particulars of that controversy, but the result of this doubt has led to considerable hardship to widows and orphans, for whose benefit the husband or the father had effected an insurance. I will instance to you a case which came within my own professional experience. A schoolmaster on not a very large salary insured his life for a sum of Rs. 10,000 in one of the Indian companies. He died prematurely. His wife and children applied to the insurance company for the money. The brother of this schoolmaster, almost a scamp, if I may put it so shortly, put in a caveat and wrote a letter to the insurance company saying "Do not pay that money. My brother is a Hindu and I am a Hindu, and I have got some claim to the amount." What did the insurance company do? When two people claim the same amount, the company has to protect itself. It cannot hand over the money to one of them, even though it believes that person to be the rightful claimant. What it did was to say to the two parties "Go and settle your quarrel in Court, we will pay later on." The result was they had to go to Court and there was a delay of nearly two years before the widow and the sons, who were minors, could get that money. Now, that hardship is a hardship which, apart from being a Hindu, apart from being a member of any other community, I suppose Members of this House will recognize to be a hardship which ought to be removed. Now, Sir, it is that hardship which is sought to be removed by this Bill, namely, to make the insurance companies safe, to protect the insurance companies, and, at the same time, to protect the widows and orphans who require protection and who cannot, under the circumstances in which they live, carry on a war against adult male relations of the deceased. Well, I had another case in regard to a foreign insurance company. The companies were already dealing with the matter very correctly, but there were difficulties when claims of this sort, Hindu joint family claims, Hindu Mitakshara family claims, Hindu Dayabhaga family claims, and all kinds of family claims are put forward. Now, the Bill seeks to do away with, or, at least, to minimise, such troubles, and it is not a new provision. It is a provision which exists in an Act of the Legislature and, owing to this clause which is in the earlier section of this Act, and the difference between two High Courts, this Bill is introduced. After all, this Bill does not affect any vested interests of people in the property of the deceased. Now, what does this section say? It says that this policy shall not form part of his estate. Hindu lawyers may rest assured that, if there is a joint family estate, it will not affect that, that claim will subsist; if there are other claims, those claims will not be defeated.

Now, there is another aspect of this insurance business. A man insures his life immediately after marriage or before marriage, and that means a provision for his wife and children. That is a well-understood method at any rate among Europeans and those who have learnt that method of provision for their families from Europeans. Now, take the case of a Hindu who is in service and earning his living. He insures his life for the benefit of his wife. The man dies suddenly. The opponents of this measure say: "No, that money should not be given to his widow." The policy, as expressed on the face of it, is for the benefit of his wife, or his wife and children. If a man pays month after month a certain share of his earnings and has said in express terms that it is for the benefit of his wife and children, what injustice is there to prevent his wife and children receiving that money. It is a pure act of justice which this Bill wants to provide for, because, owing to the interpretation of Judges, some difficulty has been felt upon this matter. Therefore, Sir, I would say that, so far as this Bill is concerned, it is a very simple measure and it only touches one part of it; it does not affect any vested interests and any persons connected with the deceased. Therefore, it ought to receive the acceptance of the House.

Mr. P. P. Ginzwa (Burma: Non-European): Sir, I had not the slightest desire to intervene in this debate, because, I frankly confess, that this is a department of law in which I am very little interested under my peculiar circumstances in Burma and I am not at all concerned with what "Mr. Manu" and other legislators in India have said about the rights of married women; but certain remarks were made by my Honourable friend from Bengal (Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary) which I cannot allow to pass unchallenged. I am aware, that an all-powerful and an all-knowing Legislative Assembly is entitled to legislate for the whole of India, but there are conditions under which I think it would be perilous for this Assembly to meddle with the interests of a province about which it knows little or nothing. (Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: "Though it was well represented.") The two objections that have been taken to any legislation being passed by this Assembly are, I submit with great respect to this House, valid, first of all, that there is no Buddhist in this Assembly. There is no doubt there is no Buddhist in this Assembly though there are some Burmans—we like to call ourselves Burmans. I see an Honourable Member (Mr. H. Tonkinson) opposite me who is also a Burman. The Buddhist law is, I submit, a law about which the ablest practitioners in India are expected to have very little knowledge because it is entirely different from the law that is prevalent in India. I do not think that we claim too much when we say "For Heaven's sake do not legislate for us because we do not wish to trouble you: you have got to make a special study of our law and it is quite possible that you may go wrong." I do not see any justification whatsoever for my Honourable friend from Bengal wishing to impose his law upon my province. Then he said that he objected to the Local Government saying that they wanted to legislate for Burma. What objection does he see to it? Why does not he ask the Government of Bengal to legislate for his province; we will not raise any objection whatsoever. It is an admitted fact, I think, it has been recorded in constitutional documents and elsewhere, that the conditions of Burma are so different from those of India that Burma ought to be allowed to work out its own salvation in its own way as far as possible. And I see every justification to the Local Government's claim that this legislation, if it is required in the Province, must be undertaken by the Local Council. But I may point out to the House generally that there is a gentleman corresponding to "Mr. Manu" in Burma whom we call Manugye.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas (Bombay City: Non-Muhammadian Urban): I am sorry, Sir, to interrupt on a point of order, but I must protest against a name which is sacred and held in the utmost respect by Hindus being spoken of in this manner. I hope my Honourable friend will have some regard for the feelings of Hindus in this matter.

Mr. P. P. Ginwala: I know, Sir, that my Honourable friend from Bombay has the utmost reverence for everybody, legislators and others, in the past, and I am very glad, Sir, he has drawn my attention to this merit of his. But this did not originate on this side of the House. However, I may point out that Manugye is one of those legislators for whom we have the highest respect and his writings are considered to be of the utmost authority in the Province of Burma at the present moment. And according to him,—he has devised a very simple form of law applicable to widows and husbands too,—whatever property is jointly acquired during the lifetime of the two partners to a marriage goes over to the survivor, subject to the rights of the eldest child; and therefore whatever difficulties you may have in the rest of India, we have no such difficulties in our Province. That is an additional reason why this Assembly should not try to impose its will upon a Province which has no desire to interfere with the affairs of India. And I beg Honourable Members in this House not to misunderstand me. There is a very strong feeling in Burma that her affairs are not understood by India and that on other occasions, when the least interference is required, much interference is made by India in the affairs of Burma; I do not think that there is any occasion for allowing Burma to feel that that is the way in which her affairs are to be managed in India both by this Assembly and the Government of India. It is for these reasons that I thought it necessary to intervene in this debate. I do not wish that this Assembly should in any way be misunderstood by the people of Burma who have only recently embarked on their new and independent political career.

Dr. H. S. Gour (Nagpur Division: Non-Muhammadian): Sir, I should like very briefly to refer to the criticisms of my learned friends Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary and Mr. Mukherjee.

The whole trend of Sir Deva Prasad's argument, I submit, is too late at this time of the day. He objects to the principle of the Bill which was accepted by the House when it committed it to the Select Committee. It has now come out of the Select Committee and all my friend can object to now is not the principle but the details of the Bill. Sir Deva Prasad has appealed to the authority of Manu. My learned friend is aware that in the days of Manu not only wives but children had no property. They were all classed with slaves (Some Honourable Members: "No, no.") as chattels. Those of my learned friends who shout "No" have not read Manu. They were all classed with slaves as chattels. (Some Honourable Members: "No, no.") In course of time they emerged from that servile condition. Surely my friend does not want to relegate his wife and children to the status assigned to them in the Manu Smriti which was composed 3,000 years ago. I am perfectly certain that that is not my friend's object.

My friend, the Honourable Mr. Mukherjee, while directing no direct attack on Mr. Kanat's Bill

Mr. J. N. Mukherjee: I did not object to the principle of the Bill.

Dr. H. S. Gour: He now assures me and the House that he does not object to the principle of the Bill. He nevertheless follows the Fabian policy of recommitment to the Select Committee. But surely yesterday you, Sir, indicated very clearly that if a Member desires that a Bill should be re-committed to the Select Committee he should indicate the lines upon which the Select Committee are to set to work. But my Honourable friend has not done so.

Mr. J. N. Mukherjee: I did. You were sleeping perhaps.

Dr. H. S. Gour: No, I was very much awake. What is the good of the Bill being re-committed to the Select Committee? The two grounds upon which my learned friend would like the Select Committee to re-cogitate on this Bill are that there are such husbands who are members of a joint family, and if they have used joint family funds for the purpose of insuring their lives for the benefit of their wives, it is the joint family under Hindu law that should participate in the benefit. And further my friend pointed out that if the husband happens to be the manager a further complicated question would arise under Hindu law. That, I venture to submit with due deference to the Honourable Mr. Mukherjee, again raises a question of principle and not one of detail. But I am prepared to answer his queries.

Mr. J. N. Mukherjee: In Bengal no such difficulties arise.

Dr. H. S. Gour: My friend interjects the remark that in Bengal no such difficulties arise. Now take the ordinary Mitakshara law. What is the position? Assume that the husband is a member of a joint family and assume, for the sake of argument, that he is its manager. Assume further that he has drawn upon the joint family funds for the purpose of insuring his own life for the benefit of his wife and children. So far as his sons are concerned, they are co-partners in the estate, and they present no difficulty under Hindu law. So far as his unmarried daughters are concerned, they are entitled to the daughters' portion. They present no difficulty. I am prepared for the sake of argument to assume that this manager has drawn upon joint funds for the purpose of insuring his own life for the benefit of his wife and children. Now what is the position under Hindu law? It is a well known principle that if a member of the coparcenary does an act inconsistent with its continuance, it causes a disruption. If the other members of the coparcenary feel aggrieved by the conduct of the manager in insuring his wife and children's lives at the family cost, they are entitled to call for a partnership. That is the first principle which the great law giver Manu has laid down. And by the way in one of his slokas he points out that partition is a very righteous thing to do and he strongly commends it, because the Brahmins profit by the partition. Two families are born out of one, and two independent sacred rites have to be performed and the Brahmins benefit thereby.

Consequently, partition is held commendable in law. My submission, therefore, is that my friend Mr. Mukherjee's objections do not 12 Noon. in any way touch the point. They create no practical difficulties so far as a joint orthodox Mitakshara family is concerned. Under the Bengal school subject to the Dayabhaga law, there is no difficulty. Where is this difficulty? That, I submit, is the plain question. The Madras High Court in I. L. R. 37 Mad. 483 have laid down that a husband has a right of insuring his wife and children or his own life for the benefit of his wife and children so as to create a trust in their favour. My friend the Honourable Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary pointed out and referred to Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar's speech on the Bill and said "will it have the effect of keeping the creditors of the family out?" I venture to draw his attention to the proviso to section 6 of the Married Women's Property Act which lays down: "Nothing herein contained shall operate to destroy or impede the rights of any creditor to be paid out of the proceeds of any policy of assurance which may have been effected with intent to defraud the creditors." It is a well-known principle laid down in section 53 of the Transfer of Property Act, and apart from the Transfer of Property Act, it is part of the general law that no policy in favour of a wife and children could be used to the detriment of the claims of creditors, and section 6 which Mr. Kamat's Bill is intended to extend by a legal expression to Hindus, Muhammadans and the rest safeguards the rights of creditors against any attempt at fraud upon them. So I submit that difficulty does not confront us. What is then the Select Committee to do? Surely, Sir, neither my friend, Mr. Mukherjee, nor Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary have indicated any lines upon which the Select Committee is to further examine the details of this Bill. I therefore submit that a recomittal would merely delay the further progress of this Bill and would not be conducive to its further progress.

Now, Sir, a few words on the merits of the Bill. I suggest that section 6 was intended, as has been laid down by the Madras High Court, to extend equally to Hindus and Muhammadans. The Bombay and Calcutta Courts have taken a different view. If this Bill is not passed into law, this conflict of authorities will still remain, but is it not the business of this House and of the Indian Legislature to set at rest conflicting decisions of the High Courts which would certainly lead to litigation and delay in the settlement of claims? On these grounds, Sir, I think that this Bill should now be passed by this House without its recomittal to Select Committee.

(Several Honourable Members: "I move that the question be now put.")

The motion was adopted.

The motion to recommit the Bill to Select Committee was negatived.

The motion to take the Bill into consideration was adopted.

Clauses 1 and 2 were added to the Bill.

The Title and Preamble were added to the Bill.

Mr. B. S. Kamat: Sir, I beg to move that the Bill, as amended, be passed.

The motion was adopted.

THE EXCLUSION FROM INHERITANCE BILL.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar (Madras: Nominated Non-Official): Sir, I move:

"That the Bill to amend the Hindu law relating to exclusion from inheritance of certain classes of heirs, and to remove certain doubts, be referred to a Select Committee consisting of Mr. J. Chaudhuri, Rao Bahadur C. S. Subrahmanyan, Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar, Mr. B. Venkatapattiraju, Dr. H. S. Gour, Lala Girdharilal Agarwala, Mr. Harendrai Vishandas, Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary, Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri, Rai Bahadur J. N. Mazumdar and myself."

Sir, the rumbling noise which the House heard just now is only the prelude to the thunder which is coming down upon my head in regard to this matter. They began, Sir, by referring to Hindu law and Hindu sacrament only for the purpose of showing that I am attempting something which is irreligious and which is opposed to the sacramental law of the country. At this time I do not propose to go very minutely into the details of the Bill. I have spoken about it on more than one occasion. On the last occasion when this matter came up in Simla for consideration I explained very fully the reasons which led me to bring this Bill before the House.

Mr. H. Tonkinson (Home Department: Nominated Official): Sir, may I ask whether this is not an adjourned debate? I understand that my Honourable friend has already moved his motion for referring this Bill to a Select Committee; he made a speech on the Bill on that occasion and it was followed by another speech. As far as I know, my Honourable friend only proposes to add two names to the Select Committee which he then proposed. Is that not so?

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: I am very willing, Sir, to be ruled out of order because I do not want to make a speech. As a matter of fact I was only prefacing my remarks with a view to lead up to this. It is unnecessary to make a speech now and if you agree with the objection taken I shall be very glad to be told that it is not necessary to make a speech. I do not want to repeat what I said on the last occasion, and if there are any remarks made by others I shall have time enough to consider the whole matter and give my reply later. On this particular occasion I ask, Sir, that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee consisting of the Honourable the Home Member (the name is not in the printed list), Messrs. Chaudhuri, Subrahmanyan, Rangachariar, Venkatapattiraju, Dr. Gour, Lala Girdharilal Agarwala, Mr. Harendrai Vishandas, Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary, Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri, and, instead of Rai Bahadur J. N. Mazumdar I would put in the name of Mr. Allen, and the Mover. As suggested by Mr. Tonkinson, for the reasons given in Simla I move that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar (Madras City: Non-Muhammadian Urban): Sir, it is rather with some regret, which is personal, that I rise to oppose this motion. The personal regret, Sir, is due to the fact that I have a great esteem for the author of this measure. He is one of those persons who has taken us into his confidence about the pilgrimage which he has made to Delhi at an early part of our career on this new Legislative Assembly. He told us, Sir, that he was yearning for improving the Hindu law, and that if his mission failed he thought that he was serving no useful purpose by being in this Assembly. Sir, we have lived two years after that statement made by my Honourable friend to my left and we have found him useful in many other directions. He took rather a modest view of his capacity. I venture to say his capacity in other directions has been more useful than his activities in this direction. Sir, as a student of law when in the eighties I began to learn Hindu law, I was struck with a famous passage in Mayne's Hindu Law,—the preface to his first edition which still rings in my ears and which I believe is still true. In the preface which he wrote to his famous book on Hindu Law this is what he said:

"A third class of opinion is that of the common-sense Englishman, whose views are very ably represented by Mr. Cunningham,—now Judge of the Bengal High Court—in the preface to his recent 'Digest of Hindu law.' He appears to look upon the entire law with a mixture of wonder and pity. He is amused at the absurdity of the rule which forbids an orphan to be adopted. He is shocked at finding that a man's great grand-son is his immediate heir, while the son of that great grand son is a very remote heir, and his own sister is hardly an heir at all. He thinks that everything would be set right by a short and simple Code which would please everybody and upon the meaning of which the Judges are not expected to differ."

Proceeding he points out:

"The age of miracles has passed, and I hardly expect to see a Code of Hindu Law which shall satisfy the trader and the agriculturist, the Punjabee and the Bengalee, the Pundits of Benares and of Ramswaram, of Amritsar and of Poona, but I can easily imagine a Code very beautiful and spacious Code which should produce much more dissatisfaction and expense than the law as at present administered."

Sir, when I read my learned friend's Bill, I was struck with the truth of that remark. Sir, it is not an easy matter to draft a Code. It is an art in itself. I was more forcibly struck with the difficulty of drawing up a Code even when the draftsman tore up to shreds small amendments to the Code of Criminal Procedure, and I truly felt that the draftsmen of the Legislative Department have developed it as an art, and it is true, Sir, it is not that every hand that can attempt successfully to draft a Code. Sir, my Honourable friend's Bill is based on wrong assumptions, hastily drawn up in his enthusiasm to modify the Hindu Law and which, if I may say so, is fraught with difficulties and traps which will benefit the lawyer. It is a simple Bill and consists of only one section. But still, Sir, when we compare it with the law as it is, I rather prefer the law as it is to his Bill. My Honourable friend's object, as he states in his Statement of Objects and Reasons, is to repeal the Hindu law or so much of the Hindu Law which excludes certain persons from inheritance. Sir, what is his title of the Bill? The title is: "This may be called the exclusion from the Inheritance Act," whereas he wants to repeal the law which excludes people from inheritance. He is enacting a law, he tells us, for the exclusion from inheritances of certain classes of heirs. Then, Sir, he wants to repeal a rule of Hindu law which he thinks or assumes exists. Where he gets that rule from I find it difficult to gather. I ransacked all the sources, but I cannot find the rule of Hindu law which he seeks to repeal. It is non-existent. What my Honourable friend says is, "Notwithstanding any rule of the Hindu law or custom to the contrary no person shall be excluded from inheritance or from a share in the joint family property by reason only of any disease." There is no such rule in the Hindu law that a person should be excluded by reason of any disease, or any physical or mental defect. It is not stated in any rule of Hindu law. The rule of Hindu law is contained in Manu and added to by Yajnavalkya which, if Honourable Members will permit me to read, will see how different it is from what my Honourable and learned friend has assumed it to be. Sir, this is the rule as stated by Manu. "Eunuchs," I omit the outcaste, "eunuchs,"—surely nobody ever contends that to be a eunuch is a disease,—“eunuchs, persons born blind and deaf”—that is not a disease, it is incapacity,—“the deaf and the dumb,”—that is not a disease, and “Nirindriya” such as the loss of the use of a limb are excluded from heredity. Sir, I fail to see where the rule is that a person afflicted with a disease is excluded from inheritance. Persons born deaf and dumb or blind, that is congenital, such as the loss of the use of a limb are excluded from inheritance, to which Yajnavalkya adds “and persons afflicted with an incurable disease” which is quite different from disease. Sir, if you want to state a rule of law and you want to repeal that rule of law, state it correctly. And then there is no rule of law which causes inclusion by reason of any physical or mental defect. It is exposing Hindu law to ridicule in the way in which my Honourable friend has stated it. Sir, the Hindu law is not so idiotic, as my Honourable friend would suppose it to be. It is based on reason, it is based on justice, it is based on well-conceived notions, so that if you want to repeal a rule of law, state it correctly, and repeal it. But do not mis-state it and try to ridicule a thing which does not exist. Sir, let us see what is it my Honourable friend has stated in his Statement of Objects and Reasons, and which he reiterated in his speech introducing the Bill. He says, certain persons, classes of persons, have been excluded from inheritance presumably on the ground that their present condition is due to sins in the former birth and are therefore not entitled to share in the family patrimony. Without questioning the soundness of this reason I am of opinion that in the times that we live in,—are we living in godless times, is that the idea? Does he mean that in these progressive times such grounds of exclusion should not be allowed to deprive a man of temporal rights? Why is it opposed to a sense of natural justice and equity? Is that my learned friend's contention? And is he right in assuming, in presuming rather, that the cause of exclusion is that the present condition is due to sins in the former birth? I do not know if my learned friend believes in a former birth. (An Honourable Member: “Very much.”) I am glad to hear that he very much believes in it, so that, it is not intended to ridicule our faith in these matters. If it is intended to catch votes from other people who do not believe in it, I must take exception to such a thing. What is the object of making that statement? A gentleman who is I know thoroughly religious in these matters, who has strong faith in a previous birth and subsequent re-births, could use it as a reason here,—I do not understand that,—and what is the reference to present day times,—present day times, unless he means we are all living in godless times when we have no faith and no religion. I can understand that, but I do not see where the trouble comes in at all. In the first place, it is wrong to presume that it is founded on any such rule of law,—except in the case of incurable diseases which Yajnavalkya has added, the other cases are cases of exclusion from inheritance based on well known principles. One well known principle on which the Hindu law of inheritance is based is this,—the capacity to offer oblations. Does my Honourable friend believe in that or not? Will you kindly read it? Does my Honourable friend believe in the efficacy of oblations? Has he to-day performed his Amavasya Tarpana in honour of his ancestors, in memory of his ancestors? He says, yes. We believe in it, Sir. Our theory of the law of inheritance is based upon that. It is all very well for men like Dr. Gour who scorn at religious and orthodox persons, to indulge in such talk, but for my

Honourable friend to my left who believes in and acts up to it, he should know that the theory of inheritance is based upon the capacity to offer oblations, upon the capacity to take part in religious worship, upon the capacity to contribute to the spiritual welfare of the family, so that it is based on that, and by this measure you want to destroy the very foundation on which the law of inheritance is based according to the Hindu law. And these people are incapable of performing it,—what can deaf and dumb people do? (An Honourable Member: "They can offer prayers.") It is not a question of prayers, it is a question of performing the Shradhas. Well, at any rate the Hindu law believes they are incapable of doing it, at any rate they are disqualified, and if they do it, it is no good; we believe in it. It is all very well for persons who have no faith in religion, that is the real secret of it, who have no faith in religion, to proceed to criticise it. Once you have faith in religion, then you feel the efficacy of it. As Mayne points out, the theory of inheritance is that it descends upon the heir—talking on this very Chapter—to enable him to rescue his ancestor from eternal misery. Consequently one who is unable or unwilling to perform the necessary sacrifices is incapable of inheritance; that is the foundation of the rule, because they are incapable of performing the ceremonies that are ordained for a householder, that they are incapable of inheriting; and look at it also not exactly from the religious point of view, but look at it from the point of view of natural justice and equity. Is it opposed to natural justice and equity to exclude persons from inheritance when they are incapable, when they would be incapable, of taking charge of and managing the property? For whose benefit are they to take charge? The Hindu law is not oppressive in that respect; it is purely a personal disability; the children of the excluded person are let in; provided they are not disqualified, they are let in, and they take the place of the excluded persons in the family. It is a pure personal disability attaching to this unfortunate individual no doubt, but as he is unable to take care of the property, it will get into the hands of scheming people if persons who are born deaf and dumb, or who are idiots, if this property is entrusted to them, it will merely get into the hands of scheming people, agents and others; and, on the other hand, the law provides that they shall be provided with maintenance. They will not be thrown into the streets,—in the shape of maintenance they get their share; their children get the property in their places; and if, by God's grace, they are cured—of course in these cases it is very difficult to expect a cure—but if really they are cured, they are put back in their position. Once they have got the property, it is not liable to forfeiture. Property vested is not taken away, and if the disability is removed, they get back the property, they get back to their position, and it is only during the continuance of the disability that they are not given a share in the property, but they are maintained out of the family fund. Now, Sir, what is the injustice in that law? For whose benefit are you giving them a share in the family property? And coming to the needs of the family, what is the object in giving him a share in the property? Is it your object to give the property to his heirs? But his heirs get it; therefore, it is not a disability which applies for ever, therefore it is only a temporary disability, a personal disability attaching to the man who is unfortunately afflicted with this incapacity. I won't call it a disease. It is a pure incapacity, a disability which attaches to the man. Therefore, Sir, I do not think that this Bill is at all necessary in so far as it attempts to remove or repeal the law as it exists.

Then, Sir, as regards this clause about "Nirindriya" persons who have lost the use of a limb, there has been some doubt. If my learned friend had attempted to remove the doubt created by a conflict of decisions in regard to whether insanity should be congenital in order to exclude a person from inheritance, he would have done some good; because on that matter there is some doubt though the consensus of opinion is that unless insanity is congenital it does not exclude from inheritance. The law has also settled it now that unless the man is from birth deprived of the use of essential limbs, that is a disability which make him a useless person, then also he is not excluded from inheritance. These points may be made certain.

Now, as regards leprosy, that is the only thing where this question of karma comes in, that is, the sins of a former birth, which my Honourable friend referred to and believes in. So far as this is concerned also, it has been settled that it is now limited to the worst possible form of leprosy. That is what Mayne says at page 870—the worst form of leprosy. If he has already inherited and subsequently becomes a leper, he is not deprived of the property. If at the time the inheritance opens he is suffering from the worst and incurable form of leprosy, what can be said in such a case? His children are not disinherited. If he has a son already that son takes his place. Therefore it is only the unfortunate individual himself who is excluded and he will be maintained out of the family funds. I do not see anything opposed to a sense of natural justice or equity in a case like that. What is it that these people who are thirsting to reform the Hindu law see in it? Do they know the principles on which these rules are based? It is a mere anxiety on their part to pose as codifiers of the law and to take the place of "Mr. Manu" as he was called this morning.

I really do not think, Sir, that we are doing any good by this piecemeal legislation. The Hindu law is not so inelastic. Customs have grown gradually; the enormities which at one time grew upon the Hindu law have been removed by judicial decisions and the growth of custom. We would have welcomed the removal of doubts on account of a conflict of decisions between various High Courts. And then there are only two points on which there is a conflict of decisions between Calcutta, Bombay and Madras, and the doubt on those two points my friend has not attempted to remove, although he calls his Bill a Bill to remove certain doubts. He has not said what the doubts are or how he proposes to remove those doubts. He simply wants, Sir, to remove root and branch this chapter on exclusion from inheritance. That is the object of this Bill. Are we going to endorse it? I will join hands with him if he seeks to remove any doubts on account of judicial decisions. But when he seeks to remove root and branch one portion of the law relating to inheritance, then I say he is doing a thing which is quite unnecessary, quite uncalled for and in utter disregard of the principle on which the Hindu law of inheritance is based.

One more word, Sir. My Honourable friend, Dr. Gour, has set a very vicious example to this House, and my Honourable friend, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar, has followed that example. Directly one community takes up its cudgels against them they drop their own cudgels. Dr. Gour told the House when he was moving the Civil Marriage Bill: "the Muhammadans are opposed to it; very well, I will drop the Muhammadans. The Parsis are opposed to it; I will drop the Parsis also." What remains? There is only the one poor community whom he can go for, the disorganized, disintegrated and divided Hindu community which is an easy prey. Similarly my Honourable friend, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar, quietly gives up Bengal. Why so? That rule of exclusion, Sir, is opposed to natural justice, opposed to equity and good conscience. He wishes to repeal it. What is good for Madras must be good for my friend, Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary, and my friend, Mr. Mukherjee. But why does he drop Bengal? They are also governed by the same rule; but, Sir, he is afraid of their votes, of their opposition. Is that the way of dealing with root principles of Hindu law? Just as Dr. Gour was afraid of the Muhammadans and dropped them, so also my friend is afraid of Bengal opposition and he says so in his Objects and Reasons and he wants to drop Bengal. I can see through it. But I hope this House will not endorse any such view. I oppose this Bill.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas (Bombay City: Non-Muhammadian Urban):

Sir, I do not know whether it is a happy or an unhappy position, but in this instance at any rate I am opposed to the motion made by my Honourable friend, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar. I do not for a moment wish to be misunderstood. I do not subscribe to all the views expressed by my Honourable friend, Mr. Rangachariar, that no Hindu reformer has a right to suggest modifications in the law of Manu. Nor do I agree with him that my Honourable friend, Dr. Gour, has, as it were, done a disservice to the community by introducing his Civil Marriage Bill. I am one of the staunchest advocates of that reform introduced by Dr. Gour. But I want to say that in dealing with questions of Hindu law one has got to understand clearly the principle on which the whole of the Hindu law is based. Not being a lawyer I am not able to define in legal terms what I believe is the principle on which the whole of the Hindu law is based. But I can express it as I understand it from what I should call, if I may be pardoned for doing so, the common sense point of view. The whole of the Hindu law is based on the principle that it does not recognize an individual as the individual is recognized in the western civilization. Its definition of the individual consists not merely of an individual but along with him his family, his wife and child. And wherever questions of the holding of property or questions of a similar character are concerned, they are not looked at from the point of view of an individual as understood in the West but from the point of view of an individual as understood here, an individual consisting of himself, his wife and his child. Now, the other thing to be taken into consideration is that in certain instances this subordination of the individual has been carried too far to a point where it affects the fundamental rights of every individual. Wherever that takes place, I think you would be justified, as my Honourable friend, Dr. Gour, has always attempted to introduce, you would be justified in introducing reform which might preserve the right of the individual against being merged too much in the rights of the family. But there is a danger of carrying this theory of the individual right so far as to subordinate altogether the fundamental principle on which the Hindu Law, I believe, is based; and it is because I believe that the proposal aims at the absolute subordination of the principle on which the Hindu Law is based that I venture most respectfully to oppose his motion. Now, why is a man, under the Hindu Law, entitled to inherit the property of his ancestor? Not because he wants to enjoy through the possession of that property. He has no right—in Hinduism—he has no right to inherit property in order only to have for himself all the worldly pleasures that are at his command which he can purchase by means of holding property. (A Voice: "Is that your view?"). My view of the Hindu Law is this, that a Hindu has a right to possess the property of his ancestor only if he has the capacity to perform the five sacrifices that he is called upon to perform because of his being a Hindu. Now, wherever you find an instance where the son of a Hindu is incapable of performing those sacrifices which is the only justification of his holding the property of his ancestor, you take away from him the right of holding that property. You withhold from him that right, but you do not take away that right from his children; and so far as that principle is concerned, it appears to me that it is a very wholesome principle. The difficulty would arise where this principle would be exploited by scheming members of a family, by hook or crook, to settle upon a person who is not insane nor otherwise has any deformity, insanity or some other incurable disease which deprives him of the right of holding property. At the same time one has to remember that there is a greater danger if this was removed from the Hindu Law of scheming persons, as was pointed out by my Honourable friend Mr. Rangachariar, of scheming persons, of lawyers, taking advantage of the deformity of a man by making him a puppet in their hands and enjoying the fruit of his possession of property. But I want again to emphasise this fact that the Hindu Law does not recognise the individual right of holding property unless the holder of such property is capable of efficiently performing the sacrifices which by the reason of his being a Hindu he is called upon to perform. And in so far as that is concerned, I am opposed to the motion of my Honourable friend, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar. I repeat that I do not think that the Laws of Manu should not be modified in accordance with the needs of the times. I believe that if the laws of Manu can be so modified as to bring about a reconciliation between the rights of the family which they insist on, and the right of the individual as understood in the West, if they can be modified so as to bring about that reconciliation, that modification ought to be welcome to everyone who loves this country and its civilization. But wherever there is a danger of either of the ideal being carried too far so as to bring about the subordination of the other ideal absolutely, there we should stand out to oppose such a modification. It is on these grounds, Sir, that I oppose the Resolution.

Mr. J. Chaudhuri (Chittagong and Rajshahi Divisions: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, I have as high regard for Hindu Law as my Honourable friend, Mr. Rangachariar, but I have no blind faith in it. The history of the Hindu Law shows that it has changed and it has progressively changed and at the present moment when Hindu Law is being administered by European Judges this growth has been arrested. Now, with regard to what my learned friend Mr. Rangachariar said about the offering of oblations and succession, that is one of the things in which I do not believe. I myself offer oblations; I do that as moral duty to my ancestors. But I believe that the theory that succession depends on the offering of oblations, is a legal fiction which was introduced into Hindu Law and which is now discredited. I have got high authorities to support my view that this theory has done more harm than otherwise. I am not arguing a case before a Law Court and I need not cite those authorities. I only mention this to show that my friend, Mr. Rangachariar, is not right in his view. I say that not only Hindu Law, but Hindu civilisation, Hindu literature, have been very progressive and they have even a scientific foundation. For instance, I do not entirely sympathise with my friend, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar, with regard to his object, but I have agreed to act on this Select Committee, because I feel that in certain respects the law might be modified. For instance, these disqualifications are based on what some would call, in scientific language, rules of eugenics. It seems reasonable that a leper should not inherit and insane persons should not inherit. Modern science tells us and modern lawyers too are also trying to legislate that such persons should be excluded from inheritance in the interest of society and our Hindu Law anticipated that. But I see no reason why a man who became blind early or even late in life and was in possession of all his intellectual faculties should not inherit. He is disqualified under Manu's Code. But the judge-made-law that we have now has departed from that in many respects. Take the case of other incurable diseases, they have been held to be no bar to inheritance or succession. So, I say these matters are the subject-matters for inquiry in connection with this Bill.

Now, something has been said about excluding Bengal. But Bengal has been rightly excluded as she is not affected in any way. I maintain that we are more progressive in regard to Hindu Law than other parts of India. We can hold individual property and we can dispose of our property just like an Englishman or any other civilized and progressive people in the world. We can give it to anybody we like. That is the reason why my Honourable friend, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar, has excluded us. If we find sons, heirs or other members of the family to be insane, we have the absolute right to settle or dispose of the property in any way we like. We would leave it to other persons, male or female, and we would not leave it to an insane person. It is not through any fear of our fighting or desperate character that the Mover has excluded us from the scope of this law. I do not wish to detain the House, but I will only say that, although I do not agree with the scope of the Bill in all its details, I have agreed to serve on the Committee because in certain cases I feel that some of these disqualifications might be inquired into, and if possible, modified, and conflicts of decision removed. So I do not think that either my friend, Mr. Rangachariar, or others who are opposing it have made out any case for not referring this Bill to a Select Committee.

Mr. S. C. Shahani (Sind Jagirdars and Zamindars; Landholders): Sir, I feel obliged to you for permitting me to give expression to my views on this question. I am a Hindu hailing from Sind, and I have listened therefore with interest to what has been said by previous speakers from other parts of India with regard to the question under consideration. I am going to say something with regard to myself. My uncle's family will probably come to an end so far as the male issue of that family goes, and according to the Hindu law, I will be entitled to inherit some of the property that belongs to my uncle. But it is a fact that it does not even enter my mind, or the mind of any member of my family, to seek to secure the property which is really due to the daughters of my uncle's line. Just now we have been told that the essential principle on which the devolution of Hindu property depends is capacity to offer oblations. No female can offer oblations to the manes of her ancestors under the Mitakshara law.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: May I rise to point of order? The point of order is this that we are at present not discussing that principle of the law which incapacitates females; it is only a question of deformed and otherwise incapacitated individuals.

Mr. President: I do not see the relevance of the Honourable Member's point of order.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: I thought the point was not relevant to the issue before us.

Mr. S. O. Shahani: Sir, I want to point out that this doctrine that is being held out for acceptance by my friend, Mr. Rangachariar, is an exploded doctrine with some of the Hindus at least. I am a Hindu. Of course Mr. Rangachariar is a very orthodox Hindu, and I have listened with very great interests to what he had to say with regard to this question. I have nothing but admiration to offer for the imaginative manner in which he has handled his untenable point, a point which cannot be maintained, according to me, by any reasonable Hindu in the present day. He has run down the present times and he thinks that those who hold contrary views are uncivilized; but I want to point out to him that I am as great, if not as orthodox, a Hindu as he imagines himself to be . . . (An Honourable Member: "If not greater.") Yes, if not greater. I am not a slavish observer of ritual. I believe less in the credal part of religion, and more in the cultural part of it. Such a belief alone will enable me to unity myself to others who profess different world-religions here in India. It is therefore that I make bold to come forward and say that in my own family I think it would be unimaginable that anyone should on the ground of capacity to offer oblations seek to secure for himself the property which ought to devolve upon the daughters of his uncle's line. I have another instance to give, and that is this. Two brothers lived in a joint family. One brother died leaving an only daughter, who has lost her mind now. Are the surviving brother and his sons to be deemed entitled to the property that has been left by the father of this maniac girl who needs protection so badly? According to the Hindus of the class to which I belong the purposes of the property are quite different to the purposes which have been enumerated by my Honourable friend, Mr. Rangachariar. I have got to point out that it was Mr. Rangachariar who had the courage on a former occasion here on the floor of this House to get up and justify the institution of deva dasis in the temples that exist in Madras. Of course he is true to his own faith, but such a faith to be recommended to others who belong to communities which can think rightly and consistently with regard to men and things in life, is, I think, at least a wrong procedure. That this sensible Bill which has been proposed by my Honourable friend, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar, should be run down on these grounds is a pity; and it will be indeed a greater pity if this Bill comes to be rejected on these grounds. One real defect in the Bill has however been referred to by my Honourable friend, Mr. Rangachariar, namely, that our Honourable friend, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar, has omitted Bengal from the purview of his Bill. I really do not understand the reasons for this omission. I do not impute motives, and I do not think that it is the desire to capture votes that has led to this omission. The omission to my mind has yet to be accounted for. If the Bill is good for all, it must be good for the Bengalees too. Bengalees are said to be a progressive people who can help themselves in the matter of inheritance. Quite true. Precisely on that ground it would not matter if the Bengalees were deliberately included amongst those who would be affected by the new Bill.

The Bill under consideration is a wholesome Bill from every point of view. So far as I see, on grounds of truth, justice and expediency this Bill ought to find favour with all of us here in this House.

The Honourable Dr. Mian Sir Muhammad Shaif (Law Member): On this Bill the Government have, after careful consideration of the opinions received from the various Provinces, decided to adopt a neutral attitude, leaving it to Honourable Members, including official Members, but excepting Members of the Executive Council who in accordance with past practice will not take part in the voting to vote on the motion as they like. (An Honourable Member: "Why not leave it to the Hindus?") That being the position of Government, it is hardly necessary for me to make a speech on this motion. But there is one point to which I think I might be permitted to invite the attention of the House. It has been said by more than one speaker that the real basis of the right of inheritance in Hindu law is the capacity to perform oblations. Well, until the passing of a certain enactment, apostacy or conversion to a religion other than Hinduism was a disqualification for inheritance, because the converted person, having ceased to be a Hindu, was thereafter incapacitated from performing oblations. Nevertheless, the Indian Legislature passed an Act (Dr. H. S. Gour: "The Lex Loci Act of 1850." Dr. Nand Lal: "Act XXI of 1850.") known as the Freedom of Religion Act, XXI of 1850, whereby apostacy or conversion from Hinduism to another religion no longer deprives a person from inheriting to his Hindu relations.

Dr. H. S. Gour (Nagpur Division: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, my friend, Mr. Rangachariar, has made a gratuitous reference to me in connection with his very orthodox views on Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar's Bill. I can only reciprocate the compliment by correcting a misstatement into which he has undoubtedly fallen in giving a historical basis for the rule enunciated by, not only by Manu, but also by the author of the Mitakshara, Vidyaneshwar, whom I shall presently cite, disqualifying from inheritance persons who are suffering from any disease. (A Voice: "Incurable disease.") Not incurable disease. Now, my friend's argument—and I hope the House will recall his argument—was that the whole doctrine of the Hindu law of inheritance is based upon the doctrine of spiritual efficacy. That, no doubt, is true, but it is a later doctrine. If you go far back into antiquity, you will find that the very same doctrine pervaded the archaic laws of Greece, Rome, Egypt and China, and the foundation for all these ancient laws was that in the nomadic life which our ancestors led the fighting man was the only man who was entitled to share the spoils of war and, consequently, a man who was impotent and devoid of sense or limb was incapable of fighting, and was therefore held to be incompetent to inherit. A spiritual form was in later days given to this extremely utilitarian doctrine which was the common doctrine of all ancient societies; but in later days when the disability survived the occasion which gave birth to it, it was said that, as the disabled people were incapable of performing sacrifices and of offering oblations to the deceased, they were incompetent to inherit. Unfortunately, the very narrow doctrine enunciated by the earliest law-givers was enlarged upon by the later Smritikars. Yajnavalkya, and his commentator Vidyaneshwar in his Mitakshara, expanded the doctrine beyond all reasonable limits. If Honourable Members will turn to the Mitakshara they will find two clauses. He first cites Yajnavalkya who says: "An impotent person, an outcast, and his issue, one lame, a mad man, an idiot, a blind man and a person afflicted with an incurable disease and others similarly disqualified must be maintained excluding them however from the participation," upon which the author of Mitakshara says: "those who have lost a sense." Any person who is deprived of an organ of sense or action by disease or other causes is said to have lost that sense. He expands the doctrine much beyond the original scope of the law of inheritance. Surely, Sir, the Mitakshara will disqualify from inheritance any of our Hindu brethren who went to France and lost their limbs fighting for their King and country. (Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: "But not the law as it is.") That is the law of the Mitakshara, that is the orthodox law, that is the law to which my friend appeals. Surely my friend could never expand the doctrine to that extent. The fact is that, in spite of the rigid orthodoxy and unbending and stern conservatism of my friend, the law has been expanding from time to time, and, at the present moment, the original purpose for which the narrow restrictions placed by the doctrine of inheritance were enunciated have been practically swept away. Cases after cases have made an inroad upon this narrow doctrine and my friend himself admits that now nothing but the shell remains; the core has been eaten up by a series of decisions of their Lordships of the Privy Council and of the Indian cases. What is the good of my friend now asking this House to re-iterate an old obsolete doctrine which is not the living law? What is the good of my friend appealing to the orthodox sentiments of my Hindu friends and saying "Please do not make any inroad upon your ancient law?" What is the good of my friend standing up here and saying that our law is based upon that transcendental fact that he who is incapable of performing a sacrifice is incompetent to inherit. My friend, Mr. Jamnadas Dwarakadas, while apologising for not being a lawyer, pointed out that the law we are now administering is the law of Manu. Will my friend be surprised to hear that, if he wishes to bring himself under the law of Manu, he had better vacate the rich possessions which he has inherited from his father, because Manu does not recognize the right of a son or wife to inherit; they are classed as chattels and have no rights of their own. (Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: "That is not correct.") Read that flagged portion, you will find the statement there. But surely my friend must not labour that point. These are ancient doctrines. The moment you examine them you find they are like geological seams lying imbedded in ancient history, and, as you come up, you see tier after tier of fresh and new growth. Coming to modern times, you find that, while you have the deepest reverence for the ancient law, you follow not the ancient law to its letter, but you revere that ancient law to the extent which is consonant with custom. Manu himself says so. He says in the closing chapter that custom is transcendental law and he points out, and that is a maxim repeated by Gautama, that, whenever people wish to know what is the correct law, let five people, learned in the law, sit together and decide. Surely, Sir, that is an injunction to this House to decide what is right. I shall give to the Honourable Members the ipsissima verba of that very ancient and sacred inculcation:

"In cases for which no rule has been given that course must be followed of which at least ten Brahmins who are well instructed, skilled in reasoning and free from covetousness, approve."

Consequently, I submit, Sir, this is the ancient rendering of the modern Reforms Act and what is contained in the sacred law books themselves. There is justification for the doctrine that these matters must be all settled by the consensus of opinion of the wise. When he speaks of the Brahmins he speaks of the learned—he does not speak of people who are ignorant Brahmins. (Laughter.) I therefore submit, that this House has not only the secular authority of the Government of India Act but the sacred authority of the best law books, for going into this question and deciding it in accordance with what is right and just.

[Dr. H. S. Gour.]

The Honourable the Law Member has pointed out, Sir, that as far back as 1850, the Indian Legislature enacted a rule adopting the unanimous recommendation of the Royal Commission appointed by the Parliament Act of 1832, sweeping away the restriction which existed under Hindu law by which the conversion to another faith was held to deprive a man of all rights to inheritance of property. Now, Sir, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar's Bill surely does not make such a sweeping change. It is a Bill which is founded on the elementary principle of reason and justice. Two brothers are born, one of them is born blind and the other is born possessed of sight. Is there any reason, I ask, why the brother who is afflicted with blindness should be excluded from inheritance? I say, Sir, that if out of the two our sympathies should go out to any one it should be to that afflicted brother. (Hear, hear.) And yet my friend would perpetuate the cruel wrong excluding those people who suffer from the loss of sight or limb from inheriting their patrimony. What justification is there for such a course? I have already pointed out that there is absolutely no justification, if you examine the question in the light of reason. Sir, I do not wish to labour this point. I can only hope that my friends, my Hindu friends in particular, will rally to the support of a measure which is intended to place Hindu law alongside the other modern laws. As my friend Mr. Chaudhuri unwittingly remarked, under the Bengal law he can dispose of his property like any civilised man. I ask, Sir, shall not our law be in line with the laws of other civilized peoples?

Dr. Nand Lal (West Punjab: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, this is a very useful measure which has been introduced by my friend Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar. My learned friend, the advocate of orthodoxy, I mean the Honourable Mr. Rangachariar, has told us to look at the soundness of the Hindu law. The soundness which he has suggested is this—"that a man who is suffering from an incurable disease cannot look after himself; therefore he is deprived of the property, so that that property may not go to outsiders. There is a provision in the Hindu law that a man who is born blind, who is a leper, who is dumb, who is deaf—the other members of the family are bound to maintain him." That is the main ground which he has set forth in refuting the arguments which were advanced in favour of this Bill. While recognizing the sanctity and superiority of Hindu law in many respects, other than the aspect before us now, may I ask him, is he not aware of some cases in which maintenance to these unfortunate men was disputed by their litigious relations. Their brothers, their relations, will go to Court and they will say "Such a man is not entitled to maintenance on this ground and that." So my learned friend must admit that, though it stands, and very rightly, intact in some cases, the orthodox stands broken, to a certain extent, in some quarters. Customs have been introduced, and, at some places, even Hindus are not governed by the strict provisions of Hindu law which he has expounded on the floor of this House. Perhaps he is being guided by what happens in his own Presidency of Madras. The fact remains, however, as has been argued by a number of previous speakers, that some of these ancient principles of Hindu law are not adhered to strictly in some parts of India. We cannot deny that fact. After all we are not living 3,000 or 4,000 years back. We should not ignore the circumstances that should guide the Legislature of to-day. My learned friend wishes that these poor Hindus may not, even in some fit cases, be allowed to see the light of day. He wishes that they may be confined to all those old provisions which under the present conditions and in some cases, do not satisfy the present time. On these grounds, Sir, I support the measure which is, if I mistake not, a very wholesome one and should have the unanimous vote of the House.

Mr. N. M. Joshi (and other Honourable Members): I move that the question be now put.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: The question is:

"That the Bill to amend the Hindu Law relating to exclusion from inheritance of certain classes of heirs, and to remove certain doubts, be referred to a Select Committee consisting of Mr. Chaudhuri, Rao Bahadur C. S. Subrahmanayam, Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar, Mr. B. Venkatapaturaju, Dr. H. S. Gour, Lala Girdhari Lal Agarwala, Mr. Harchandrai Vishandas, Sri Deva Prasad Sarvadinkary, Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri, Mr. B. C. Allen and Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar."

The motion was adopted.

THE HINDU LAW OF INHERITANCE (AMENDMENT) BILL.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar (Madras: Nominated Non-Official): Sir, I believe that the objections to this Bill were fully set forth by the previous speakers, and I also think the answers to those objections have been given by previous speakers. This bill is absolutely necessary in order to enable certain female members to inherit before agnates to the seventh degree. This place would be earlier. I find that even my friend, Rao Bahadur Rangachariar, says this is a reasonable Bill, so there is no necessity for me to say any more on the subject. I move:

"That the Bill to amend the Hindu Law of inheritance in certain particulars and to remove certain doubts, be referred to a Select Committee consisting of the Honourable the Home Member, Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar, Rao Bahadur C. S. Subrahmanayam, Rao Bahadur P. V. Srinivasa Rao, Mr. B. Venkatapaturaju, Munshi Iqbal Saran, Rao Bahadur Nishi Kanta Sen, Mr. Harchandrai Vishandas, Mr. B. N. Misra, Mr. E. G. Bagde, Mr. K. C. Neogy, Dr. Gour, Mr. T. P. Mukherjee and myself."

The motion was adopted.

THE MUSSALMAN WAQFS REGISTRATION BILL.

Maulvi Abul Kasem (Dacca Division: Muhammadan Rural): Sir, I beg to move:

"That the Bill to provide for the Registration of Waqf estates and the proper rendering of accounts by the Mutawallis of such estates in British India be referred to a Select Committee consisting of the Honourable the Home Member, Mr. P. E. Percival, Khan Bahadur Sayyid Muhammad Ismail, Mr. Zahid Ali Subzposh, Mr. W. M. Hussainally, Mr. Asad Ali, Khan Bahadur, Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar, Chaudhuri Shahab-ud Din, Mr. Muhammad Yamin Khan, Khan Bahadur Sarfaraz Hussain Khan, Khan Bahadur Zahiruddin Ahmed, Mr. Abdur Rahim, Haji Wajihuddin, Mr. Kabeer-ud Din Ahmed, Maulvi Miyan Asjad-ul-lah, Nawab Ibrahim Ali Khan, Lala Girdhari Lal Agarwala, Maulvi Abdul Quadir, and myself."

Sir, this Bill was introduced some time back, and I had to wait taking any further action on it because the Government of India had asked for opinions from the Local Governments and they were awaiting the replies. This is a very simple measure though it might look rather a cumbrous one on the face of it. The object of this Bill and the principle which I want to press before this House is that there should be some sort of control over the administration of waqf estates. It is well known not only to my co-religionists in this country but to all my fellow-countrymen and also to members of the Government that trust properties in this country are very much mismanaged, and the mismanagement and misconduct in the administration of these trust properties has become an outstanding scandal in this country. Several attempts were made from time to time by various individuals and public bodies to get a remedy, but unfortunately they have always failed for one reason or another. I have purposely confined myself to Muhammadan trust properties because I wanted to proceed on the line of least resistance. I know for myself and I have been told that the case of the trustees of Hindu charitable endowments are not better than that of the Muhammadan institutions. But, Sir, I thought it better to confine it to the endowments affecting Mussalmans only. It is not intended in any way by this Bill to interfere with the rights, the privileges or the powers of the mutawallis or trustees of these waqf estates, nor is it intended to give anybody a right of interference with their work. The only thing which is wanted essentially is that every mutawalli of a waqf estate should get his waqf properties duly registered in a public office and that the mutawallis should be liable to render accounts of his receipts and expenditure. Unfortunately, Sir, we have found it the case that mutawallis of waqf estates generally and the majority of cases treat trust property as their own personal property. Cases are numerous where these mutawallis have not only used the usufruct of these properties as their own, but have borrowed money by mortgaging those properties and have sometimes even effected a sale of waqf properties. As long as they have some of these properties left they never admit that it is waqf property, but when every inch of land appertaining to that trust is sold and goes into the hands of non-Muhammadans the mutawalli appears before the members of the community in a plaintive mood and says "This is Muhammadan property which has gone into the hands of Hindus." But primarily the mutawalli himself is responsible. In fact a large portion of waqf trust properties in my province has gone into the hands of either non-Muhammadans or to Muhammadans as their personal property. In any case where litigation was started to recover these waqf properties, it was found that the interests of third parties and of bonâ fide purchasers were affected, and in equity and justice our claims could not be pressed further. Therefore, Sir, I want, and I have been asked by my constituents to demand it, that all these waqf properties should be duly registered in public offices so that if anybody advances money on these properties or if anybody wants to purchase those properties he has an opportunity of ascertaining whether it was the personal property of the mutawalli or whether it was trust property in his charge. He will do so with his eyes open and without any misapprehension.

The second point is that there should be some sort of control. This control is to be exercised by a committee consisting of Muhammadans only over the accounts and the work of the mutawallis. I am not a lawyer myself and I do not claim to be at all a good draftsman. I have drafted the Bill to the best of my ability; in fact I have copied the sections from various Bills presented either in the Viceroy's Legislative Council or elsewhere by distinguished lawyers and other people; and I admit that there is much to be improved. The best course to do that would be to refer the Bill to a Select Committee and therefore I have taken particular care to include in the Select Committee distinguished lawyers so that we may have good legal opinion and draftsmanship and a large number of my Muhammadian friends so that all shades of opinion may be expressed and the matter thoroughly discussed in the Select Committee. I have been told, Sir, that the Local Governments in their opinions are unanimous in saying that this a measure which ought to be left to the provincial Legislatures and that this Assembly should not legislate for the whole country, this being one of the transferred subjects or subjects which should be dealt with provincially. I beg to submit, Sir, as I did when introducing this Bill, and as the then Leader of the House, Sir William Vincent, remarked, that although it may or may not be a question from a technical point of view to be decided by the provincial Governments and by the provincial Legislatures, I think that in such an important question as the administration of waqf estates there should be a uniform law for the whole country and not conflicting Acts, one for Bengal, a second for the Punjab, a third for Madras and a fourth for Bombay. Therefore, Sir, I hope this House will agree with me that the time is ripe now when we should do something about the proper management of trust estates and trust properties.

It does not, fortunately for me, interfere with any personal law, that is to say, Muhammadan law or with any religious institution, and therefore I have no apprehensions of treading on delicate corns. Certainly it will affect the vested interests of the Mutawallis, but here we have to consider not the interests of Mutawallis who are in charge of trust properties but of the beneficiaries who are to be benefited or who have to enjoy the trust properties. Waqf properties were created by pious men for the benefit of humanity and their co-religionists and it will be a great misfortune to the country if the money which was earmarked for the benefit of humanity and certain classes of people, were to be misappropriated by other people which was never the intention of those who created these Waqf Estates. The Mutawalli of the biggest waqf properties in my province is the Government of Bengal, and even under their management carried by a subordinate I am afraid the waqf is not properly managed and controlled. Therefore, Sir, the necessity was felt, and felt keenly for a long time for such a Bill as this. Mr. Bangachariar said that when my friend Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar came to this Council he did it with the object of introducing certain reforms in the Hindu law. Sir, I came to this House not with that purpose, but with a distinct mandate to press this Bill before this House, because attempts were made previously by myself and my friends in the local Legislature to introduce a legislation of this kind, in fact this very draft was sent to the Bengal Government and they sent it to the Government of India. The Government of India then refused sanction for its introduction in the local Legislature, because at that time they said it was not a matter for the Provincial Council but for the Viceroy's Imperial Legislative Council. But now that my people in Bengal have sent me here with a distinct mandate to press this Bill, I have been told that I have brought it after the reforms and this is a subject which devolves upon the Provincial Governments and it is not for the Members of this House to consider. I submit, Sir, again, that in an important measure like this there should be uniformity of law for the whole country, and the law that prevails in the Punjab should prevail in Bengal and other parts of India as well. Therefore, Sir, I hope that the Government and the House as a whole will support this measure. Of course the Bill will have to be redrafted and reconsidered and minor defects will have to be removed in the Select Committee or when the Bill comes before this House at a later stage. I hope, Sir, that the House will accede to my request and commit this Bill to the Select Committee for its proper consideration.

Mr. President: The motion moved is:

"That the Bill to provide for the Registration of Waqf Estates and the proper rendering of accounts by the Mutawallis of such Estates in British India, be referred to a Select Committee consisting of the Honourable the Home Member, Mr. P. E. Percival, Khan Bahadur Saiyid Muhammad Ismail, Mr. Zahid Ali Subzposh, Mr. W. M. Hussanally, Mir Asad Ali, Khan Bahadur, Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar, Chaudhri Shahab-ud-Din, Mr. Muhammad Yamin Khan, Khan Bahadur, Sarfaraz Hussain Khan, Khan Bahadur Zahiruddin Ahmed, Mr. Abdur Rahim Khan, Haji Wajihuddin, Mr. Kabeer-ud-Din Ahmed, Maulvi Mian Asjad-ul-lah, Nawab Ibrahim Ali Khan, Lala Girdharilal Agarwala, Maulvi Abdul Quadir and the Mover."

Mr. K. Ahmed (Rajshahi Division: Muhammadan Rural): Sir, there are certain difficulties which

Mr. President: Is the Honourable Member raising a point of order?

Mr. K. Ahmed: Yes, Sir. You will see, that my friend, Maulvi Abul Kasem, has no justification at this stage to refer this Bill to a Select Committee, because it was first introduced in September, 1921. After that, we have had three Sessions of this Assembly, and my friend's Bill is suffering from that disease which is incurable. I would refer Honourable Members in this connection to page 29 of the Manual of Business and Procedure of this House. Paragraph 80A, page 29, of this Manual reads as follows: "On the termination of a Session, Bills which have been introduced shall be carried over to the pending list of business of the next Session: Provided that, if the Member in charge of a Bill makes no motion in regard to the same during two complete Sessions, the Bill shall lapse,"—as it has lapsed, Sir, "unless the Assembly, on a motion by that Member in the next Session, makes a special order for the continuance of the Bill." Sir, my Honourable friend in his opening speech to-day said that he was not quite sure of his drafting. At the same time he said that we shall try again to sit together to re-draft the Bill. Sir, it is not a question of re-drafting only nor is it a question of putting additional Members on the Select Committee, but he is afraid, Sir, because I am sure he has been sleeping over this Bill not only at the last Session but at the Session previous to it also

Mr President: I would like the Honourable Member to state his point of order.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Sir, then I take the objection that my friend cannot refer his Bill to a Committee at this stage after the expiry of two Sessions, because it infringes the rules laid down in our Manual of Procedure and Business, and, I submit, Sir, that this Bill should be thrown out

Mr. President: I do not quite appreciate the Honourable Member's point.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Sir, if you will kindly read section 80A, at page 29, of the Manual of Business, you will see

Mr. President: Quite so, I have referred to the section. Will the Honourable Member show me how that applies to the motion made by Maulvi Abul Kasem?

Mr. K. Ahmed: Maulvi Abul Kasem introduced the Bill on the 26th of September, 1921. That is clear, I suppose, Sir. If that is so, then after the September Session, 1921, at which he introduced this Bill, we had two Sessions last year and then again this year

Mr. President: Does the Honourable Member suggest that Maulvi Abul Kasem has not made the necessary motion within these two Sessions?

Mr. K. Ahmed: Yes, Sir, he has not.

Mr. President: Then the Honourable Member is wrong, because he has made the motion

Mr. K. Ahmed: I do not find it, Sir. If he has, I shall be very thankful if that will be pointed out to me, Sir.

Mr. President: I would recommend the Honourable Member to exercise his intelligence in finding out why Maulvi Abul Kasem is in order.

Haji Wajihuddin (Cities of the United Provinces: Muhammadan Urban): Sir, I heartily support the motion brought forward by my Honourable friend, Mr. Abul Kasem. I only wish to say that the name of Sayad Rajan Baksh should be added to the Select Committee.

Mr. President: The amendment moved:

"That the name of Sayad Rajan Baksh be added to the Select Committee."

The motion was adopted.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Sir, I oppose the Bill, because it cannot be moved at such a late stage. I have shown you the rule. I do not understand how in the last three Sessions

Mr. W. M. Hussanally (Sind: Muhammadan Rural): Sir, the Chair has given a ruling, and Mr. Kabeer-ud-Din Ahmed is not right in again speaking on this question

Mr. President: The Honourable Member can leave the Chair to take care of itself. I recommended the Honourable Member (Mr. Ahmed) to exercise his intelligence in understanding the Standing Order, but apparently he does not propose to do so.

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: Is it right for Mr. Kabeer-ud-Din Ahmed to speak again when the Chair has given a ruling once?

Mr. President: It was not a ruling—merely a recommendation to the Honourable Member from Bengal.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Sir, now I shall have to oppose the Bill. The principle of this Bill stated by him in the Statement of Objects and Reasons is already contained in our existing law. We have got section 92 of the Civil Procedure Code, 1908, and under this section we can file a suit for rendering a proper account or for a declaration invalidating candidature of certain Mutawallis if they have misappropriated any thing out of the waqf property. Besides this, Sir, my friend admitted that this Bill was pressed in the Bengal Council, and they said that it was the look-out of the Imperial Council and hence it was referred to this Assembly to move this Bill. Thereafter, Sir, in 1920, there was an enactment in regard to this; it is Act XIV of 1920, called the Charitable and Religious Trust Act, framed with the same object, Sir, with which probably my friend has been induced to bring in this Bill before this Assembly. Therefore, Sir, we have got sufficient protection under the present law, as it is,—it is Act XIV of 1920, which has simplified the whole matter with regard to charitable and religious trusts in this country, and section 8 of this Act applies also equally to waqf property and Mutawallis in this country.

[Mr. K. Ahmed.]

Therefore, Sir, it is not only unnecessary but it is really contrary to the principle and object for which Government has already provided enough law, sufficient safeguard, for the people of this country.

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: Is that a Provincial or a Government of India Act?

Mr. K. Ahmed: I cannot follow my friend.

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: Is the Act you are quoting a Provincial or a Government of India Act?

Mr. K. Ahmed: It is an Act called Act XIV of 1920, passed here only two years ago, Sir. I suppose my friend now will find that it is a Government of India Act. If that is so, he will find also that it was only a few months before this Bill was introduced into this Assembly that Government brought out safeguards for meeting my friend's difficulties and, therefore, this part of the Bill is unnecessary. Further, Sir, my friend has been saying in this Assembly this morning that the Government of Bengal now is afraid because the Bill has been introduced here and they do not like that this portion of the law should be passed everywhere, but every provincial Government has got a right to pass its own law. The Government of Bengal has given its opinion and it says this: "The proposed Bill, however, appears to be badly designed and proposes a scheme which will interfere with the legal rights of the Mutawallis and bring itself into conflict with the Muhammadan law. Having regard to the general trend of Muhammadan opinion which is opposed to the Bill, the Governor in Council is unable to lend its support to it. The times, too, are not propitious for this legislation." That being so, my friend's questions with regard to it probably will be swept away from the opinion that has been read. Then, Sir, we find other difficulties because in the Charitable Endowment Act, in respect of the Muhammadan religion the Government has always followed the policy of non-interference. The Mutawallis have to do certain acts, as far as their Mutwalliship is concerned, and then they will have to follow certain guidance or direction of the donor that has been set out in the trust deed: in the Waqfnama the Mutawallis are empowered to perform some functions set out there, as for instance to say their prayer, ask persons engaged or appoint persons to offer certain things in the prayer house, and so forth. And the proposed Committee under sections 2 and 3 of this Bill, I think, will have the power of appointing even agents or naib Mutawallis; which will be interference with the Mutawalli's power at least, and that sort of interference is not allowed by the Muhammadan Law. And since, the Muhammadan Law interferes with the principle of my friend's Bill the Muhammadans of India would not approve of it. There is something which has been mentioned in regard to legislation of these Waqf properties. My friend proposes to simplify matters, so that the money-lender may not be misled. Well, Sir, he may be the benefactor of the money-lenders who are very much fond of lending money to the Mutawallis and taking mortgage of their property. But for this purpose if they go to the Registrar in the Registration Office, they will find who the Mutawallis are and where the properties are situated; so the names of the Mutawallis and the description of the property are available there. In every district there is also a Collectorate where there is a Record Office which will furnish the required particulars.

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: I rise to a point of order. I believe my Honourable friend, Mr. K. Ahmed, is now criticising the details of the Bill, which I believe at the present moment he has no right to do. The question before us is whether the Bill should be committed to a Select Committee or not, and I think he ought to confine his speech to that.

Mr. K. Ahmed: If my Honourable friend will kindly confine his attention to follow the principle which is exactly against the points that I am describing, I suppose the whole matter will be simplified. We see, Sir, the principal object of my friend who introduces the Bill is that there must be a Registrar, and if there are already registers kept by the Government officers which will be of great benefit to the people who want to lend money, what is the necessity, Sir, for this Bill? What is the principle and object set out in the Statement of Objects and Reasons of the Bill? Their position is not in any way better off, but as it is stated therein that it is difficult under the present law to find out the names of Mutwallis and the description of the properties. If they are, Sir, already safeguarded by the present law, and since 1920 at least when Act XIV was passed in this House there is enough provision of law, what is the necessity for introducing this Bill? I say there is no necessity for bringing this Bill at all. Then, Sir, since the principal objects of this Bill is contrary to our tenets of the Muhammedan religion, because it interferes with the functions of the Mutwalli, and because it will interfere with the donors' intentions in settling a property and saying that the income should be spent for certain purposes and it should be managed by certain persons—as a matter of fact we find from generation to generation, from son to grandson, people of the family manage the property,—why should there be this law, Sir, to interfere with that poor Mutwalli and to establish a District Committee? Sir, the District Committee or the District Magistrate or the Collector has not got any money, he has not got the money to defray the expenditure that is necessary. Then section 3 of the Bill contemplates a Central Committee, that is to say, in every province there will be a Central Committee, whose duty will be to go to the district and supervise the activity of the branches of the District Committee over which the District Magistrate will sit, and preside. The District Magistrate will preside over it as ex-officio member. Therefore my friend in the way he has put it is not accurate. Here he has certain rules of law of the waqf estate, but how is that to be put in practice without sufficient money in hand. Government is not going to help in the matter unless they can show sufficient funds in hand. Where is that money coming from? Is there anything in the Bill to provide for the maintenance of those branch district committees and the central committee? The Chief Justice of the Bengal High Court and of the majority of the other Judges of the same Court have in fact opposed this Bill on this particular ground. The Calcutta High Court says:

"The Chief Justice and Judges do not think that a case has been made out for amending the procedure under section 92 of the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908. The provision as to damages would, in their Lordships' opinion, probably encourage fraudulent claims."

So there will be multifarious cases instituted against the Mutwallis and the object for which the endowment has been made will be defeated. Any person having a grudge against a Mutwalli or his rival relatives will bring a suit against him and that will interfere greatly with the discharge of his duties and the donor's object will be frustrated. That being so, Sir, I vehemently object to the Bill. There is behind this Bill Sir, a sinister motive: A person bringing a false suit against a Mutwalli may have that suit dismissed with costs, but there is nothing in the whole Bill which provides for the recovery of that money from the person bringing the suit. With regard to the balance which may be outstanding in the hands of the Mutwalli, there is no provision as to how it is to be spent, and that point the central committee or the branch district committee will have to determine. I understand that Dr. Gour has the intention of supporting this Bill. I shall be glad if he will enlighten us as to the principle of the Bill and I shall wait to hear him with great pleasure.

But since, Sir, there are so many difficulties and my friend, who has introduced the Bill, has kindly selected me and others to sit together and to redraft the Bill, we will have to recast the whole thing. That duty must be undertaken by the Honourable Member who introduces the Bill. He must know what the Bill is. If there are mistakes and additional alterations are necessary here and there, it can be carried out, but I do not think there is any practice in this House for the Honourable Members to redraft the whole thing and recast it altogether. In that case matters will be simplified if my friend will withdraw his Bill to-day, and take our help and introduce another Bill probably before the expiry of the Session. With these few words I oppose the Bill.

The Assembly then adjourned for Lunch till Five Minutes to Three of the Clock.

The Assembly re-assembled after Lunch at Five Minutes to Three of the Clock. Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar was in the Chair.

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: I rise, Sir, to support my friend Mr. Abul Kasem in his proposal to refer this Bill to a Select Committee.

Mr. C. A. H. Townsend (Punjab: Nominated Official): On a point of order, may I ask if there is a quorum present?

Mr. Chairman: Yes.

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: Sir, this Bill has now been before the public for a considerable length of time and opinions in almost every part of the country have been expressed in regard to it. The state of Muhammadan Waqfs all over the country, from one end to the other, has been such as to call for remedial measures urgently to protect them in almost every province, and the misappropriations that have been committed by Mutwallis have run into almost a proverb. In my own part of the country there have been several cases of that kind in which mutwallis have actually sold mosques or lands attached to mosques or graveyards. (Mr. K. Ahmed: "Please speak up.") I thought my friend Mr. Kabeer-ud-din Ahmed had better ears. At the present moment there is a case of the kind pending in the Judicial Commissioner's Court in Sind in which some Saiyids, who are mutwallis of a very important graveyard in Karachi, have sold large plots of land for a large amount of money. So far as enlightened Muhammadan opinion is concerned, Mr. Abul Kasem cannot be too much thanked for having brought this measure forward before this House. I am sorry, Sir, that I could not follow my friend Mr. Kabeer-ud-din Ahmed. (Mr. K. Ahmed: "Nor can I follow you.") I am sorry, Sir, I could not follow my friend Mr. Kabeer-ud-din Ahmed in his attack upon this Bill. No doubt he made a very coherent speech, but to me, unfortunately, it was almost Greek. So far as I remember, Sir, he quoted the opinion of the Bengal Government as being against this measure, but, if he had turned over the pages of the Blue-Book, which is now before me, he would have found that almost all intelligent and enlightened Muhammadan opinion in all provinces is in favour of this Bill, and several Local Governments have also pronounced their opinion in favour of the principle of the Bill, though some do not agree with the details.

I will begin, Sir, by quoting the Madras Government. Here is what they say:

"The Honourable the Minister in charge of the Religious and Charitable Endowments has had the advantage of discussing the main principles of the Bill with the leading Muhammadan representatives in the Legislative Council, and the views expressed and the observations made in the following paragraphs have their full support.

Enlightened Muhammadan opinion in this, as in other Presidencies, is practically unanimous that a very large number of endowments made by pious Muhammadans in the past have been wasted or converted to the private benefit of individuals contrary to the wishes of the original founder, that their administration in many cases has come to rest in the hands of inefficient and unscrupulous mutwallis and that effective measures should be adopted at an early date for preventing waste and mismanagement of Muhammadan public trusts and to ensure that the endowments are appropriated to the purposes for which they were founded. The need for suitable legislation is therefore obvious.

The law governing Muhammadan religious endowments in this province is Act XX of 1865 and a few Muhammadan committees exist in certain districts. They have not been successful in preventing misappropriation and mismanagement."

Sir, I shall proceed further. Let us come to Bombay and see what the Bombay Government say. It is this:

"It will be observed that the Anjuman-i-Islam, Bombay, while approving the proposal for the registration of waqfs, is opposed to the complicated and detailed interference in their management which the provisions of the Bill would entail. * * *

There is, however, a very considerable body of opinion in favour of some measure for compulsory registration of waqf estates and for the maintenance and publication of accounts. If a practical measure of this nature can be devised, the Government of Bombay would favour it. It would be necessary to prescribe that all expenditure should be met from fees prescribed for the purpose or otherwise and that no part should fall on Provincial Revenues."

The Honourable Mr. Justice Aston says:

"I approve of the provisions of the Bill."

In Bengal, again, I find Maulvi Shams-ul-Rahman, Secretary, District Muhammadan Association, Khulna, says:

"I have the honour to inform you that the Registration of Waqf Estate Bill was discussed at a meeting of my Association and am of opinion that the Bill is a necessity in order to prevent misuse of waqf estates by their mutwallis, but with these following modifications in the Bill itself."

Then he goes on to suggest certain modifications with which for the time being we are not concerned.

[Mr. W. M. Hussanally.]

I could go on quoting, Sir, from several opinions, both of European and Muhammadan officers, as well as public men; but I do not wish to waste the time of the House. The United Provinces Government say :

"It will be observed that the majority of those consulted are emphatically of opinion that some machinery for improving the administration of waqfs is eminently desirable, since there are undoubtedly many cases of mal-administration, though possibly the case is stated somewhat too strongly in the preamble to the Bill."

The Punjab Government say :

"I am to point out that the opinions of none of the large holders of shrines, who in the Punjab are fairly numerous and very influential, have been received, but it is anticipated that these men's influence would be thrown against the Bill, as undermining their prestige and requiring a stricter system of accounts than most of them have been in the habit of keeping.....His Excellency in Council suggests that the Bill should confine itself to the compulsory registration of waqfs and the publication of accounts and these processes should be carried out not by the Collector, but (as with companies) by the Inspector-General of Registration."

Then, Sir, I would quote the opinion of the Honourable Khan Bahadur Mian Fazl-i-Husain, Minister for Education, Punjab :

"The Muhammadan public opinion is in favour of a Bill providing for registration of waqf estates and the proper rendering of accounts by the mutwallis of such estates."

The Burma Government say :

"So far as the Bill simplifies the procedure by which dishonest mutwallis may be brought to book, it seems to meet with general approval."

Bihar and Orissa say :

"Muhammadan opinion in Bihar and Orissa generally welcomes the Bill in principle, and the Governor in Council accepts the need for some better regulation of the administration of waqfs than the existing law provides."

Sir, it will thus be observed that perhaps with the exception of the Bengal Government almost all the other Governments are in favour of the principle of the Bill. My friend, Mr. Kabeer-ud-Din Ahmed referred us to Act XIV of 1920; in his opinion that Act is quite sufficient for the purpose for which this Bill is intended. But if he had read that Act a little more carefully he would have found that that Act does not affect the question that is in issue at the present moment. The Bill as brought forward by my friend, Mr. Abul Kasem, is a sort of preventive measure and has for its object the compelling of mutwallis to register their estates and keep regular accounts; whereas Act XIV of 1920 applies only when a breach has been committed by these mutwallis. Until a breach has been committed I do not think that that Act can apply. Moreover so far as that Act is concerned, only a man having an interest in the property can move the Court, and I am not sure whether any Muhammadan can move the Court, because the word 'interest' is a very wide one, and I do not know if Courts would hold that any Muhammadan has got sufficient interest to move them.

Then again, Sir, what is the eventual remedy under this Act XIV of 1920? We must go once more to section 92 of the Civil Procedure Code, that is to say, we must go again and file a suit for the mismanagement of the estate. The only difference, if one proceeds under this Act XIV of 1920, would be that whereas under section 92 of the Civil Procedure Code, the sanction of the Advocate General is required, under this Act no such sanction would be necessary when a District Judge has decided that a breach has been committed. Therefore, I believe, that this Act XIV of 1920 has absolutely no application to cases which would be covered by this Bill if it passes into law. I wish, Sir, my friend Maulvi Abul Kasem had made his Bill more general so as to apply to all kinds of trusts, whether Hindu or Muhammadan. In that case, perhaps all my friends here would have helped him all the more readily. But all the same, I would beg of my Hindu friends to support this Bill, because if they do so and if this Bill is passed into law, their turn will come next, and so far as the Hindu endowments are concerned, I have not the slightest doubt that in every part of the country there are very large endowments, perhaps larger than even Muhammadan endowments, which require protection as much or perhaps more than what Muhammadan endowments require. So far as the Government in this matter are concerned, I am sorry to say that it is my impression that they are going to oppose the Bill, not because that they do not like the principle of the Bill, but because they consider that times are not propitious. That would be, I believe, their principal objection that they will take to the Bill. I am not sure, Sir, that times are not propitious for a Bill of this kind. On the contrary, I am strongly of opinion that times are more propitious now than what they would be any time hence. The feeling of the Muhammadans all over the country, more especially of enlightened Muhammadans, barring those who have got vested interests in these endowments, is generally in favour of a measure of this kind, and the feeling of the Muhammadan public generally is changing from day to day with regard to the management of these estates. I am not sure, Sir, if this Bill is thrown out, that we will not be having another Akali movement in India so far as the Muhammadans are concerned, because the Muhammadan public feel keenly that their endowments should be managed well and regular accounts should be kept and should not be misappropriated. I therefore warn the Government that if they do not allow this Bill to pass into law, they will have very considerable difficulty with the Muhammadans of the country in a very short time. Sir, I support the Bill and also the motion that it be referred to a Select Committee.

Maulvi Miyan Asjad-ul-lah (Bhagalpore Division: Muhammadan): (The Honourable Member spoke in the Vernacular*.)

Mr. J. Chaudhuri (Chittagong and Rajshahi Divisions: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, I rise to a point of order. The Honourable Member is commenting on the details of the Bill. Will the Honourable Chairman decide whether it is relevant?

Dr. H. S. Gour (Nagpur Division: Non-Muhammadan): The Honourable Member has long since dealt with the principle of the Bill. Now he is going on clause by clause analysing its purpose and commenting upon it and what it should contain. At this stage I submit this discussion is a little out of order.

Mr. Chairman: The Honourable Member is bringing his remarks to a close.

(Maulvi Mian Asjad-ul-lah intimated that he had finished.)

Mr. H. Tonkinson (Home Department: Nominated Official): Sir, I wish in the first place to express the sincere sympathy of Government with the object of the mover of the present motion. He desires to ensure that the religious endowments which have been made by pious Muhammadans in the past shall not be wasted. That, Sir, is an object which I think must commend itself to all Members of this House. The Bill, Sir, was introduced on the 26th September, 1921 and was circulated by order of Government. My Honourable friend Mr. Hussanally has referred to some of the opinions of Local Governments. I think that it is of the utmost importance in connection with this Bill that we should carefully consider those opinions, and accordingly I do not propose to apologize for again reading out some of the opinions. We will take the Government of Madras. My Honourable friend read paragraph 4 of their letter; he omitted paragraph 5. Paragraph 5 says:

* The original speech together with an English translation will be printed in a later issue of these Debates.

[Mr. H. Tonkinson.]

"I am however to point out that such legislation is more appropriately left to the local Legislatures, and though the latter may not, without the previous sanction of the Governor General, modify or repeal any of the provisions of the Charitable and Religious Trusts Act of 1920, they have still ample scope for legislation in this direction. The case for all India legislation on a matter of this kind is therefore in the opinion of this Government extremely weak.

A deeper analysis of existing conditions, however, indicates that for many years to come it will be the part of wisdom to continue this policy. Muhammadan feeling is very sensitive to outside interference with their religion and particularly so under the present political conditions. This Government are therefore emphatically of opinion that it is from a political and administrative point of view unsafe to cast on the Collector of a District, as Mr. Abul Kasem's Bill proposes to do, duties which are bound to bring him into frequent and serious conflict with Muhammadan religious feelings of the orthodox type."

I submit, Sir, that the whole principle of this Bill is involved in the control given to the Collector. We will turn to the Government of Bombay. The Government of Bombay commence their remarks as follows:

"The Government of Bombay are of the opinion that the adoption of the Bill would involve a decided reversal of the long-established policy of non-interference in religious matters. The opinions elicited indicate a wide divergence of opinion both as to the principles of and as to the practical expedients proposed in the Bill. Though endeavours were made to ascertain the views of the Muhammadan community, very little interest has been evinced, and many of the local officers report that they have not succeeded in eliciting any reply, from the Muhammadan Anjumanis and Associations consulted."

Then follows the passage that was read by my Honourable friend:

"In addition to this,"

the Local Government go on to say:

"the burden of labour and responsibility which would be entailed on the executive officers of Government would be excessive. On these grounds, the Government of Bombay consider that the Bill should be opposed."

My Honourable friend read the next paragraph, which I submit is a paragraph not applying to the present Bill. He then referred to the remarks of Mr. Aston, the Additional Judicial Commissioner in Sind. He read the first six words or so which were to the effect "I approve of the provisions in the Bill", he omitted the following words "except those in Chapter III (which should in my opinion be omitted)"—those, Sir, are all the provisions in the Bill relating to Committees—"and the subsequent provisions relating to central and district committees". If all the machinery goes, Sir, then there is nothing left in this Bill.

I do not think my Honourable friend referred to the opinion of the Government of Bengal. They say:

"In reply, I am to say that there is a general consensus of opinion that something should be done in order to prevent the misappropriation of charitable and religious endowments by dishonest mutwallis, and to recover charitable funds which have fallen into the hands of private parties as there can be little doubt that there are many and valuable waqf estates throughout India, including Bengal which are grievously mismanaged and misapplied by their mutwallis or trustees. . . .

The Governor in Council would therefore welcome a well designed Bill to deal with such endowments."

"3. The proposed Bill however appears to be badly designed and proposes a scheme which will interfere with the legal rights of the mutwallis and bring itself into conflict with the Muhammadan Law. Having regard to the general trend of Muhammadan opinion which is opposed to this Bill, the Governor in Council is unable to lend his support to it. The times too are not propitious for such legislation."

We then go on to the United Provinces. The first sentence was read by my Honourable friend; the next sentence was not. It runs:

"On the other hand, those who have been consulted are almost unanimous in condemning the provision of the Bill which proposes to throw upon Collectors the onerous and invidious duty of improving the administration of waqfs."

and so on, Sir. We can go through all the opinions of the Local Governments who have really summarised the opinions of the different authorities—official and Muhammadan—consulted by them. While it might be said that there is very general opinion that endowments made by pious Muhammadans in the past are being wasted, there is practically an unanimous opinion, Sir, from all the authorities consulted against the Bill. One of the great objections taken is to the work to be thrown upon the Collectors. My Honourable friend, Mr. Hussanally, objects to references to detail, but, Sir, under the Standing Orders of this House I think details must be referred to in so far as they are necessary to explain the principle of the Bill. Under section 4 of the Act the Mutwalli is bound to submit information to the Collector within whose jurisdiction the waqf property is. Under section 5 the Collector has to call for further information, and so on. Accounts have to be submitted to the Collector. Then the Collector is ex-officio President of the District Committee. This District Committee, presided over by the Collector, under clause 18, has to obtain full information from the public records or by inquiries respecting all waqfs, and so on. Sir, this Bill does not distinguish at all between waqfs of large value and waqfs of small value, and the labours which will be thrown upon the Collector by its provisions would be intolerable. Sir, I ask the Assembly to recognise that this Bill deals with a transferred subject, the subject of charitable and religious endowments. How, Sir, can we properly and rightly in this Central Legislature throw upon the Ministers who are responsible for the administration of that subject, the burden which it is proposed by this Bill to throw upon them notwithstanding their opinions, as expressed in these letters from the Local Governments. I do not wish, Sir, to refer to the long discussion which took place in the sixties of the last century which led to the Act of 1863 by which Government executive officers were dissociated from the exercise of authority over religious trusts. Nor do I wish to refer at length to the very lengthy discussion which eventually resulted in the Act of 1920, which in my opinion was very relevantly referred to by my Honourable friend, Mr. Kabeer-ud-Din Ahmed. The main principle of that Act I may say was that any general all-India enactment should not authorise or sanction any system of control over these endowments by the executive authority, but should recognise the agency of the civil court only and through them afford further facilities for obtaining information regarding the working of these endowments and controlling the action of dishonest trustees. The scope of this provision may in time be extended by local or general enactment, but this Bill is fundamentally opposed to the principle adopted in the Act of 1920. The Indian Legislature may pass this

[Mr. H. Tonkinson.]

Bill, but if the Bill is passed, I think there is little doubt that the Muhammadan public will not accept this as evidence that the Bill was really needed. I think there is no doubt that the conservative section of Muhammadans will undoubtedly be hostile to the operation of this Act. I believe I am merely stating a fact, and I do so with no intention to cast any discredit upon them, but is it not true that the Muhammadan masses are singularly ignorant, gullible and fanatical? Would not the persons entrusted now with religious endowments organise opposition to this Bill if it ever becomes law, and would they not quite easily be able to excite fanatical feeling in connection with this subject? The Executive Government of India is responsible for law and order, but we do not wish to have to meet all the odium which will arise from the administration of such an Act as this. That odium, Sir, will fall on the Executive Government and not on the Legislature. And is the Legislature prepared to accept responsibility for the manner in which this Bill will be administered? Government frankly admit the needs for effective control, but the present measure is, in our opinion, unsuitable. We are not opposed to the principle of better supervision over these religious endowments, but we think, that any legislation going widely beyond the lines of the Act of 1920 should generally be local legislation. Machinery for control must be machinery designed or accepted by the responsible Ministers. It must also not associate the executive authorities of Government with the detailed control. You, Sir, are well aware of the Bill now before the Madras Council. I believe that that Bill has met with a good deal of opposition. It possibly goes too far, but, so does the present Bill. I may add, Sir, that, if any Local Government desires to pass legislation dealing with the subject, and does pass such legislation in their local Councils, then the Government of India are prepared to take all steps required to supplement such legislation as may be necessary. We, Sir, cannot, however, accept the principle of this Bill, and, therefore, I must regretfully oppose it.

Khan Bahadur Sarfaraz Hussain Khan (Tirhut Division: Muhammadan): Sir, after hearing my friend, Mr. Hussanally, I thought that the Bill was supported generally by Government, but I fear that his not having read lower down would mislead the House. I wish to be fair, and, after listening to these two gentlemen, Mr. Tonkinson and Mr. Hussanally, I thought that, unless I dealt with these two paragraphs, I would be misleading the House. The Madras Government says:

"I am, however, to point out that such legislation is more appropriately left to local Legislatures; and, though the latter may not, without the previous sanction of the Governor General, modify or repeal any of the provisions of the Charitable and Religious Trusts Act, 1920, they have still ample scope for legislation in this direction. I am to add that this should not be understood as a mere technical argument based on the letter of the Devolution Rules. The conditions of the different provinces vary considerably. Muhammadan public opinion in religious matters in this province, for instance, is far less advanced than in certain other provinces of India, and is not prepared to accept legislative inroads into custom and usage with the same readiness that those other provinces appear to be. The case for all-India legislation on a matter of this kind, is, therefore, in the opinion of this Government, extremely weak."

I have also seen the opinions of other Local Governments and, in my opinion, they are generally opposed to the Bill. Now, with regard to the opinion of Muhammadans, I have been trying to read these opinions. Baluchistan is a Muhammadan country and with regard to that province it is stated:

"The matter has been referred to the Anjuman-i-Islam at Quetta which represents the organised Muhammadan opinion of Baluchistan. That body has presented a unanimous opinion against the introduction of the measure in this province. Its members view with suspicion any official interference with the management of what is purely private religious property and would strongly resent any attempt to hamper the unfettered administration of these pious trusts by members of the community for whose use they were ordained. The ordinary law should in their opinion be able adequately to provide for differentiation between fraudulent dispensations and genuine charitable provisions."

After reading these opinions one cannot help saying that the Government generally are opposed to the Bill, not to speak of the people also. The organised opinion of the Muhammadans in Baluchistan is opposed to the Bill.

Mr. J. Chaudhuri: Are the Indian Muhammadans opposed?

Khan Bahadur Sarfaraz Hussain Khan: Yes.

Now you have to look to the condition of the country also. In paragraph 7 the Madras Government say:

"Proceeding to the principles of Mr. Abul Kasem's Bill, I am to refer first to the main point raised in your reference, viz., whether a departure should now be made from the principle which Government have followed since 1863 that the executive officers of Government should be entirely free from any connection with religious trusts. It is quite possible to argue that, with the introduction in the provinces of an executive responsible, though partially, to a representative Legislature based upon a wide electorate, this policy of non-interference need not continue to be sacrosanct. A deeper analysis of existing conditions, however, indicates that for many years to come it will be the part of wisdom to continue this policy. Muhammadan feeling is very sensitive to outside interference with religion and particularly so under the present political conditions."

Then I wish to place one more point before the House and it is this—We have got Ministers now and these Trusts are under those Ministers. Is this all-India Legislature entitled to pass this legislation and force it upon them unless they want it? That is a point for the whole House to consider. If they consider that this all-India Legislature is entitled to force legislation upon them without their consent and without having consulted them, then I have nothing more to say and will not oppose the measure. But I want to place these different points before the House: Firstly, that the Government, almost all the Governments are opposed to it; secondly, that Muhammadan opinion, though divided as I have said, yet reasonable and sound Muhammadan opinion is also opposed to it. This is a very important piece of legislation. It affects not merely the interests of one of two men, but the whole of India. Looking at the Khilafat movement, if you go deeply enough into the matter you will see there is something very deep in it. Please look at every side of the question. Do not merely think of the mismanagement of certain Waqfs, pass over such things, brush them aside. You must go more deeply into the matter and see what the effect of this legislation on Indian Muhammadan public opinion and especially on the religious minded section of it will be. I have placed all these facts before you and I do not think that an all-India legislation would be very desirable. It should be left to the Provincial Governments. But if the House considers that the Bill should be referred to a Select Committee, I shall do what I can for it there; only I must take exception with regard to this point, whether it is not a matter which should be left to the local Councils.

Khan Bahadur Abdur Rahim Khan (North-West Frontier Province: Nominated Non-Official): Sir, I must first apologise to my friend, Mr. Abul Kasem. To tell you the truth, up to the last moment I agreed with him and promised to support the Bill; but after listening to the different speeches, I do not think I can keep my promise. It is in the interests of Muhammadans that I wish to appeal to him. I have got some observations to lay before him in particular and before this Honourable Assembly in general. The first thing is that we know that unfortunately the Muhammadans are not so much educated as other communities. I am coming to that point. That would mean open war with our religious heads and it will also be a great discouragement to our political propaganda, because the educated people who are few in number will go against the religious heads who are worshipped by the masses, and the masses will go against the educated classes. That would mean that there will be no co-operation between the educated and the uneducated masses, and so I think it is in the interests of the Muhammadans in particular that this Bill should be dropped at once.

I will now come to the other point; an Honourable Member said that this will lead to an Akali movement. If we were all educated it would not have mattered—I think in fact it would have been the best thing for us that could happen. But unfortunately we are not all educated. In the case of the Akalis they were all of one mind and one voice. But unfortunately there is a difference of voice and a difference of mind here. Moreover there is another point which I wish to make out. The Assembly will excuse me if I say it, but I do wish to say, what is the opinion of local Governments? I speak as a Muhammadan and I think that should have more weight than the opinion of the Government. Government has to look at it from its own point of view and we have to look at it from our point of view. I am certainly one with the Government in thinking that it will have a lot of troubles if it will interfere in this matter. I think that Government will be ungrateful to a good many religious heads who have been helping it in many ways. At such a time as this if the Government interferes I think it will create a lot of troubles of no end for itself. I think Government should not interfere on this point and I would appeal to my Honourable friend, Mr. Abul Kaseem, that he should drop the Bill because he has gained his point; the Akali movement has awakened every religious head and they know how they stand; I do not think they will misuse the trust properties in their hands; if they do misuse I think they have had enough warning and in future we can take care against such misuse. At present I think they will be careful and will not give us an opportunity to move this Bill again. So I appeal to my friend to drop the Bill and I appeal to my Muhammadan friends to look at it from a broad point of view. I think we are few in number and the masses outnumber us and they are not educated; these religious heads, these Pirs have got great influence over them and I think we will be ruining our political propaganda if we go against them at such a time.

Chaudhri Shahab-ud-Din (East Central Punjab: Muhammadan): Sir, I make no apology either to the Mover of the Bill or to any other Member of this House for the remarks which I propose to make. The Honourable the Government Member began by an expression of sympathy with the principle of the Bill and ended in certain fears which he entertained about the actual operation of the Bill if it was passed into law. I have heard diverse opinions of Members from the farthest town in British India on the North-West Frontier and from the most southern town where Muhammadan voice appears yet to exist and I regret to find that they hold diametrically opposite views. I belong to a province which claims the largest percentage of Mussalman population. (Cries of 'No, no', Bengal.) Please listen. In the Punjab the Mussalmans are 55 per cent. and in the five districts of the Frontier they are 93 per cent. In Bengal the Mussalman population is not 55 per cent. I say this without any fear of contradiction. (A Voice: "You mean percentage.") Yes, that is what I said and meant. Therefore, I think, Sir, that so far as my own province is concerned, and so far as my capacity as a representative of the Muslim community allows, I am in a position to voice its views better than those gentlemen who come from provinces where the Mussalman population is only 2, 3 or 4 per cent. Sir, this is a very important question and has been exercising the minds of the Muslim public, at least in my province, for the last 25 years. One of our recognised leaders, the late lamented Mr. Justice Shahdin, took considerable interest in this question. He collected information and he even corresponded with all the leading Mussalmans of India, and he was determined to see the Muslim Waqfs managed properly, but circumstances did not permit him to do so. Sir, whatever may be the views of the Honourable Mian Sir Muhammad Shafi as a Member of this Government, I hope he will stand up as a member of his community to say whether I am right in saying that that is the feeling of the Mussalmans of the Punjab. Years ago they formed an association in the Punjab called the Anjuman Auqaf-al-Muslimin. They have been trying to protect certain Waqfs from being wasted or misused, but as there is no legal sanction to back them up they have not succeeded in their efforts. I think, Sir, it is the duty of the Government to put a stop to misappropriation of Waqf income or Mutwallis committing criminal breach of trust. That is what is needed. We do not want more. Can the Government say that it is not its duty to stop criminal breach of trust in the country? I think it is the first duty of a State to protect the Waqf property from being criminally misappropriated or criminal breach of trust being committed with regard to it. We do not want the Government to interfere with our religion, and by putting a stop to the criminal breach of trust by Mutwallis they will not be interfering with our religion in any way. If our religion allows the managers of endowments to commit criminal breach of trust, then, of course, the Government may refuse to interfere because they will not interfere with our religion. But I fail to see how interference with religion can come in. Our religion expressly enjoins that every Muslim should discharge his trust most faithfully and honestly. Therefore if the managers of religious endowments act dishonestly, they deviate from the path of rectitude, righteousness and honesty, and it is the duty of the Government to protect the public money from being wasted. If Government is afraid of doing that, I think they are afraid of performing a duty which is the first function of every Government to perform.

With regard to some of the dangers to which reference was made by the Honourable Mr. Tonkinson, I must say that I realise them. There are difficulties indeed and our path is not so smooth as some may imagine it to be. There are rocks and shoals, and we must take care that we steer clear of all difficulties. But that is not a reason for throwing out the Bill. Let us accept its principle; let it be committed to the Select Committee; let the Select Committee modify it, let its language be improved and embellished and let all objectionable clauses be omitted or modified. And then, if necessary, we can again send the Bill in its improved form to Local Governments for opinion. Section 74, clause (c) of our Business Bye-Laws says: "After the presentation of the final Report of the Select Committee of a Bill, the Member in charge may move that the Bill as reported by the Select Committee be re-circulated for the purpose of framing further opinion thereon". So if necessary, when the Bill comes up again before this House, it may be re-circulated. But there is reason to throw out the Bill at this stage while expressing sympathy with it. In the words of Sir Walter Scott "Should the path be a dangerous one"—"The danger's self is lure alone"—I think a strong Government, as the Government of India is, should not be afraid of doing its duty. It must do it and do it manfully. I must point out that unless the Government is prepared to catch the bull by its horns, it is possible, I can't say it is probable, that the Akali movement to which reference has been made by certain speakers, might be repeated in certain provinces; at any rate in certain districts of my province. I think in saying this I am doing my duty towards the Government as well as towards the community which I represent. We should gauge public opinion now and try to satisfy its legitimate demand so far as we can. As regards the opinions of Local Governments, we can very easily meet them by inserting in the Bill a little clause to the effect that a Local Government may when it deems expedient or necessary introduce the Act in the whole or part of its Province. That is to say, it may be provided in the Bill itself, that it may be introduced by a Local Government with the sanction of the Governor General in Council, when the Local Government deems it expedient or necessary to do so. But we should not shirk our duty and responsibility, we must do it, and do it well. No one can deny that the income of religious endowments is being wasted, misappropriated, and mis-spent, and yet no one can raise his voice. We must see that every trustee performs his duty as a trustee. Government is perhaps the biggest and strongest trustee, and I expect it to perform its own duty as a trustee. With these remarks, I support the principle of the Bill, and not, of course, its provisions, nor its language. The principle must be kept in view, and the whole Bill may be re-drafted by the Select Committee; and if necessary opinions will be re-invited by re-circulation of the improved Bill, I have to make one remark about the personnel of the Select Committee. I do not know what reasons actuated the Honourable the Mover in recommending the personnel of the Committee, but I think that the personnel is not what it ought to be: I would suggest, if the President will allow me to do so that the names of the Honourable Mr. Tonkinson and the Honourable Dr. Gour should be added on so that they might help us with their experience and knowledge.

[Chaudhri Shahab-ud-Din.]

Maulvi Abul Kasem: Sir, in offering a few words of reply, I have in the first place to congratulate the opponents of the Bill for having secured the services of my distinguished friend, Mr. Kabeer-ud-Din Ahmed, to lead the opposition. He made an excellent speech, but from what I did understand of that speech, I could only gather that he said that the present law was quite sufficient to meet the occasion and to control the trustees of these religious endowments. I may remind him that in the province from which he and I come, there are various endowments, big and small, but in the course of the last fifty years of which I have got information, there were only two cases instituted in the Civil Courts under the provisions of the law as it stands, and one was by the Maharaja of Giddhaur against the Mahant of Deoghar, and the other by the Government of Bengal against the Mutwalli of a Waqf estate. But, Sir, where can we get wealthy territorial magnates to come forward to take upon themselves the responsibility, the expense and burden of carrying on litigation on behalf of poor people who are deprived of their rights in religious institutions? And where can we get a strong Muhammadan Member of Government to agitate and to convince the Government of the necessity in these hard days of spending Rs. 65,000 simply to remove a mutwalli? The provision lays down that any two Muhammadans or any two persons interested can go to a Court. But why should anybody go and take upon himself all the worries, the troubles of litigation in a Civil Court and bear the expense and risk chances of paying the expenses of the other side as well? We in this country have enough of litigation for our own private reasons: and we want to avoid litigation as far as possible. And sometimes peace is purchased at a sacrifice. Will anybody venture to come up and at least invite litigation, and invite it without any personal gain? I do not believe it.

Now, Sir, Mr. Tonkinson on behalf of the Government began by saying 4 P.M. and the same thing was said by other members of the Government, that he was full of sympathy with the principle of the Bill. What I ask to-day, Sir . . .

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Sir, I never said that I was full of sympathy with the principle of the Bill. I said that I wished to express the sincere sympathy of Government with the object of the Mover of the Bill, not with the principle of the Bill at all, Sir.

Mr. Abul Kasem: That was a technical mistake on my part. The sympathy was for the object I had in view. I am grateful for that. But they admit that Muhammadan waqf estates are mismanaged. They admit that the situation is such as to call for some remedy, for some action. What do they propose to do? We in this country, Sir, have been accused times out of number of being destructive critics; we are known only as hostile critics; we have no constructive programme to offer. I find, Sir, that in this instance the Government comes forward with sympathy with the object of a motion, recognizes the necessity for some action, but at the same time only offers the destructive motion that it should be thrown out; they have brought forward no constructive suggestion in this connection. This is not the first time that this question of Muhammadan endowments and all endowments has engaged the attention of the Government. Greater men than myself, distinguished men, have brought it to the notice of Government. Committees have been formed: meetings have been held: conferences have been held: but all have ended in smoke. Sir, my Honourable and gallant friend from the North-West Frontier Province and the Members of the Government have both made much of the masses who, they say, will rise in arms if a measure like this is brought forward. Unfortunately, Sir, the illiterate masses of India are made use of by everybody in this country for his own purposes. Whenever the Government has to defend or stick to a reactionary measure, or to oppose a liberal movement, they come forward on behalf of the masses of this country and they say that the illiterate masses do not want it, it is the infinitesimal minority of the educated classes who do. Whenever any public man, if you like to call him a public agitator, wants to throw his programme on the Government, he just gets up on the platform and says that the masses are behind him. But the masses never speak. Unfortunately they do not. I think if they could and did speak out, they would be emphatic in their support of the measure which is now engaging the attention of this House.

[Mr. Abul Kasem.]

Sir, a good deal of the opposition of the Local Governments is based upon the fact that the Collector of the District has been made responsible in many cases and because a good deal of the burden and responsibility will fall on his shoulders. And my Muhammadan friends Mian Asjad-ul-lah and Khan Bahadur Sarfaraz Hussain Khan have also expressed apprehensions on that head. Sir, I have repeatedly said when introducing this Bill and when making this motion this morning that I am myself not enamoured of the provisions of this Bill, and I have admitted that, not being a lawyer and not being a qualified draftsman, I have only copied out the provisions from various Bills and proposals submitted before the public from time to time, and that the question whether the District Collector should be the Chairman of the Committee, or whether it should be elected by an electorate or appointed by Government is a matter purely of detail with which we are at the present moment certainly not concerned. Sir, the principle lays down that endowed properties are to be duly registered in a public office, naturally the revenue office. And the second point is that there should be committees supervising and controlling, at any rate supervising and exercising a sort of control over the trustees of these waqf estates both in the districts and at headquarters of the province. These are the two main principles. If you are opposed to these two principles, you are welcome to throw it out. As I said at the outset, so I say again that I have a mandate from my constituents, who unfortunately happen to be Muhammadans, to press this Bill before this House and my duty is finished. I will have to press it to the last and if it is thrown out, the responsibility for it will lie on the Members of the Government and the Members of this House and not on my shoulders.

Then, Sir, it has been said that it is a matter entirely for provincial legislation, because it is a transferred subject and that Government does not want to interfere with religious usages and religious institutions. Whoever asked the Government to interfere with these institutions or to control them? The only thing is that we want authority from the Legislature to constitute a body which could exercise some sort of control over these trustees, who are, as my distinguished friend Chaudhri Sahab-ud-Din said, criminally misappropriating public funds. What would have been the state of these trust properties if we had a Muhammadan Government in this country? There would have been a Department of Waqf in the Cabinet itself, a portfolio dealing with Waqf estates, such as there are in all Muhammadan countries. Do these Governments interfere with the religious institutions of those countries? Somebody has said, Sir, I believe Mr. K. Ahmed, that the intention of the waqif will be destroyed. He ought not to forget (Mr. K. Ahmed: 'I said intention of the donor.')—donor, well, you will find that waqif merely means donor. He ought to remember that the object of this Bill is that the waqfnama in which the intentions of the donor (if he understands it better) are detailed should be registered, so that people may find out what the intentions and instructions of the donor were. I have been told, Sir, that my sympathies are with the money-lender. However much I may admire the business capacity of these money-lenders, I am not one of them. My interest is for the protection of trust properties, and why I referred to these money-lenders was that Mutwallis have their names registered as owners in the Collector's register, with the result that they mortgage the property and sell them to money-lenders and others and after they are sold the Muhammadan community cannot regain them, because the Courts will not allow a third party and a bonâ fide purchaser to be cheated out of his money. To protect that I intended the registration of these properties. It will protect the estates and if any money-lender hereafter went and gave money to a Mutwalli on his waqf property, he will do so with his eyes open and will have no defence when he is called upon to give back that property. That was my object, and, Sir, I happen to be Mutwalli of a small waqf estate. I would challenge anybody to go to the Collector of Burdwan and find out anywhere that I am the Mutwalli, that I am not the real owner of the property. My name is registered as the owner of the property in the register. My father's name was similarly registered, and if I choose to call myself the owner, there is nobody who can prevent it. To give you one instance about the seriousness of the situation, a big waqf property was left by a pious Mussalman to another gentleman, not a member of his family, who became the Mutwalli. After his death, there was a dispute in the city of Burdwan among the various relatives of the dead Mutwalli as to who should be the Mutwalli and the members, and the leading members of the Muhammadan community, if I may so call them, by which I mean the Muhammadan pleaders, Muhammadan Mukhtears and one or two merchants, sat there to settle up this dispute among the family members of the Mutwalli and to make the award. And what decision did they come to?

They said the best course would be to divide the property according to the Mussalman law of inheritance and have their names registered separately, and it has been done, and it has been done after the introduction of this Bill. It is not a question of private trust for waqf is a charitable endowment unless it is waqf al il aulad. Therefore, Sir, I do not want to detain the House, but I extremely regret, and reciprocate the regret of my friend, Mr. Abdur Rahim Khan, that I cannot accede to his request and withdraw the motion, because I have a duty to discharge to the people who have sent me here, and I will feel I have done it if I press the motion, and if the House rejects it, the responsibility will rest with the House.

(An Honourable Member: "I move that the question be now put.")

Mr. H. Tonkinson: I wish to offer just a few remarks on the course which this debate has taken. I would like, first of all, to invite the attention of the House to the fact that this Bill is not in principle simply a Bill providing for the registration of waqfs and the waqf accounts. It goes far beyond that. The whole principle of the Bill is in the control, control in clause after clause, which is given to the Collector.

Maulvi Abul Kasem: Those clauses may be deleted.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Sir, we are asked to approve the principle of a Bill which gives this control in one clause after another to executive authorities, control over religious endowments, a thing, Sir, which the Government of India, so long ago as 1863, definitely decided that their executive officers should be disassociated from Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary (Calcutta: Non-Muhammadan Urban): How did Government assent to its introduction?

Chaudhri Shahab-ud-Din: Cannot those clauses be omitted if the Bill is put to the House?

Mr. Chairman: The Honourable Mr. Tonkinson will proceed.

Mr. H. Tonkinson: Sir, much play has been made of the fact that we on the Government side have merely given destructive criticism to this Bill, but, Sir, under the present constitution the whole of this subject is a Provincial matter. What responsibility have we, I would like to ask my Honourable friend, Chaudhri Shahab-ud-Din, over the control of charitable and religious endowments here? I have said, Sir, that Government are quite prepared to supplement, so far as may be necessary, any legislation which any Minister may introduce in any local Council. That, Sir, is, as I said, absolutely as much as we can undertake to do. To judge from the letters received from Local Governments, we have practically all the Ministers who will be responsible for the administration of this Bill opposed to it. I therefore, Sir, oppose the motion.

Chaudhri Shahab-ud-Din: Sir, with your permission, may I just say a word?

Mr. Chairman: No. I cannot permit the Honourable Member to speak now.

The motion before the House is:

"That the Bill to provide for the registration of Waqf Estates and the proper rendering of accounts by the Mutwallis of such Estates in British India, be referred to a Select Committee consisting of the Honourable the Home Member, Mr. P. E. Percival, Khan Bahadur Sayyid Muhammad Ismail, Mr. Zahid Ali Subzposhi, Mr. W. M. Hussanally, Mir Asad Ali, Khan Bahadur, Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar, Chaudhri Shahab-ud-Din, Mr. Muhammad Yamin, Khan, Haji Wajih-ud-Din, Khan Bahadur Sarfaraz Hussain Khan, Mr. Abdur Rahim Khan, Khan Bahadur Zahiruddin Ahmed, Maulvi Mian Asjadullah, Mr. K. Ahmed, Nawab Ibrahim Ali Khan, Lala Girdharilal Agarwala, Maulvi Abdul Quadir, Mukhdum Sayyid Rajar Buksh and the Mover."

Chaudhri Shahab-ud-Din: May I suggest, Sir, the addition of two names for the Select Committee, and, if the House commits the Bill to the Committee, those two names may be included. They are the names of Mr. H. Tonkinson and Dr. H. S. Gour.

Mr. Chairman: The Honourable Member can move that with the leave of the House. Has the Honourable Member the leave of the House? (Cries of "Yes, yes.")

The names were added.

The Assembly then divided as follows:

THE LAND ACQUISITION (AMENDMENT) BILL.

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu (Godavari cum Kistna: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, I move:

"That the Bill farther to amend the Land Acquisition Act, 1894, be referred to a Select Committee consisting of Mr. N. M. Samarth, Mr. J. N. Mukherjee, Sardar Bahadur Gajjan Singh, Mr. Hussainly, Mr. B. Venkatapattiraju, Mr. Jamnadas Dwarakadas, Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar, Rai T. P. Mukherjee, Bahadur, and myself."

I find some difficulty in providing for the representation of the official Members on the Committee, since neither the Law Member nor the Revenue Member to whose department the subject matter of this Bill relates is a Member of this House. If the Government proposes to add any official Members to the Committee, Sir, I shall be quite agreeable to that. Now, Sir, the House will remember that I introduced this Bill in the Delhi Session last year. It was subsequently circulated for opinion and a large body of opinion, both official and non-official, has been collected. I proposed to move this Resolution last September, but the Government then said that they were contemplating the introduction of a larger and more comprehensive measure to amend the Land Acquisition Act and suggested that I might await the result of that. I find, Sir, that the Government has put forth no measure of their own so far, and I do not know whether they have got materials ready for framing a Bill even now. This House is coming very near to its close and I do not wish, therefore, to put off this matter any further and I therefore make this motion for referring this Bill to Select Committee.

Sir, the object of the Bill is threefold. One is to provide a statutory remedy against unlawful or vexatious acquisition of land. Another is to prevent the officer responsible for selecting the site and making the preliminary inquiry in regard to it, being appointed Collector for the purpose of making the award; and the third object is to prohibit the Collector from enforcing his own order. Of these three, the first is the most important and I shall devote the greater part of my remarks to that object.

In all civilised countries, Sir, the right of private property is recognised. Every individual has a right to hold and keep his property not only as against every other individual but also against the Government. But Government is in all civilised countries given power to compulsorily acquire private property when that course is necessary in the public interest, and therefore we see the Government in India also is empowered to compulsorily acquire land for public purposes. That power is conferred by Act I of 1894 on the Government. The power to acquire land compulsorily is given by an Act of the Legislature and therefore it follows, Sir, that the provisions of the Act should be strictly followed and it also follows that there must be some safeguard provided against excessive or improper use of the power given by the Legislature. There is no such safeguard provided now under Act I of 1894. Section 4 of the Act provides that "When it appears to a Local Government that land in any locality is needed for a public purpose a notification to that effect shall be published in the official Gazette, and the substance of that notification made known at convenient places in the said locality." Thereupon it shall be lawful for an officer authorised by Government to enter upon the land and take measurements, fix boundaries and do all necessary acts preliminary to the acquisition of the land. This is called the preliminary investigation. When this is over, and it is decided to acquire the land, section 6 of the Act provides that a declaration to the effect that the land is needed for a public purpose or for a company be published in the official Gazette, and "the said declaration shall be conclusive evidence that the land is needed for a public purpose or for a company, as the case may be, and after making such a declaration the Local Government may acquire the land in the manner hereinafter appearing." Section 11 which deals with inquiry and award by the Collector gives power to the landholder to raise objections only in regard to three matters, namely, in regard to the measurements of the land, the value thereof and the respective interests of the several persons claiming compensation. If the landholder does not accept the award of the Collector, he can, under section 18, ask the Collector to refer the matter to the Civil Court. It will thus be seen, Sir, that the landholder has no opportunity to object to the acquisition itself on the ground that the purpose for which it is proposed to acquire the land is not a public purpose or that the acquisition is improper. As soon as a notification stating that the land is required for a public purpose is published, the notification by its very publication becomes conclusive evidence that the land is required for a public purpose and the question cannot be re-opened. Thus you will see, Sir, that under the law as it is, the owner of the land which is proposed to be acquired has no opportunity to raise any objection to the acquisition itself. I do not mean to deny that in certain provinces there are some departmental rules requiring some sort of notice to be given to the landholder before the notification is published in the Gazette, but that is not a statutory remedy, and it can be changed at any time by the Local Government. Moreover, Sir, from my experience of the working of that rule in the Madras Presidency, it affords very little protection to the landholder against improper acquisition. He puts in a petition objecting to the acquisition, and does not know what has become of it. No inquiry is held. He is given no opportunity of showing how the acquisition would be improper. He knows in fact nothing about his petition, and the only thing he knows of the whole matter is when he gets a notice from the Collector informing him that he proposes to make an award. The Collector says to him in his notice "I am holding an inquiry as to the amount of compensation that is payable to you on such and such a day, so you can come and make your representation." That is the only notice the landholder gets about the matter. Till then he knows nothing, because no inquiry is held, and he is not given an opportunity to adduce any evidence to show how the acquisition will be improper. Therefore, I say, Sir, that although there are departmental rules in some provinces, they do not afford the protection to which the landholders are entitled. I shall now show, Sir, that there is ample ground for supposing that the existing law does not contain any effective remedy against improper acquisition of land. I shall first quote, Sir, some of the official opinions that have been received on the Bill itself. I shall take the Government of Bombay first. The Bombay Government admit, "That the present procedure for the acquisition of land causes occasional hardship and gives rise to complaints which are not always without foundation." I am quoting their opinion. "And it is in view of the compulsory nature of the action taken that it is desirable that opportunities should be given to the owner of the land which is sought to be acquired to state his objections to the acquisition." Here is the opinion of the Consulting Surveyor to the Government of Bombay. "I am thoroughly in sympathy with the proposal to allow persons interested in the land which it is proposed to acquire, the fullest opportunity of registering their objections before acquisition. Dealing with the acquisition of property all over the Presidency including Sind, as I have to, I have been impressed over and over again with the real grievances of the owners of properties who have never had the slightest opportunity of objecting to the acquisition of their properties. It must be definitely recognized that Government is to be the final arbiter to decide as to whether the land should be acquired or not, and if this statement is accepted, I strongly urge the desirability of the abandonment of the policy which has been in vogue hitherto of exercising over the owners of landed property such vast powers as are possessed by Government. It is of the utmost importance that the public should feel that they will be given every opportunity of a full and unbiassed hearing of the other side of the case. I am fully convinced that if the public were given such opportunity, many of the objections which come to my notice of compulsory acquisition of properties would be reduced to almost vanishing point." Sir, what can be more convincing than such an opinion coming from such a source? Then, Sir, this is what the Chairman of the Bombay Trust says on the subject: "The present procedure for the acquisition of land causes occasional hardship and gives rise to complaints for which there is considerable foundation. It is, in view of the compulsory nature of the action taken, desirable that an opportunity should be given to the owner of the land which is sought to be acquired to state his objections to the acquisition, but these objections should be limited to the grounds that the acquisition is not for bond fide public purposes, or that the land has been selected for some private reason." The Judges of the High Court of Bombay have "no doubt that considerable dissatisfaction has been caused in recent years by Government acquiring land under the Act for private Companies." The Government of the United Provinces says that, after consulting certain officers who have much experience of land acquisition work, it "is of opinion that there is some justification for allowing the owner of the land sought to be acquired the right of objecting on the ground that the land is not required for a public purpose, or that more is being acquired than is really necessary." The District Judge of Ahmedabad, in the Bombay Presidency, says that "there have been cases in which it has been argued with considerable force that the proposed acquisition was being made not because it was absolutely necessary for the purposes of the Company but because it was a cheaper alternative to another course which the Company was bound to take," and then he proceeds to give a concrete case which came before him, which illustrates the present method in a very striking manner. This is, Sir, what he says about a matter which came before him in Compensation case No. 10 of 1919:

"Four gunthas out of a plot of land belonging to one Manicklal Motilal by which stood a Bungalow, a well and several outhouses and abutting on the Kaira Trunk Road, which provided the most convenient passage to the bungalow and its surroundings were acquired for the Nadiad Kapadvanaj Railway; compensation was allowed for the same, the owner being assured at the same time that another passage would be provided. This passage was not promptly provided, and a long correspondence ensued between the owner on one side and the Collector of Kaira and the Railway authorities on the other. Subsequently a plan of the proposed road was sent to the owner and he was informed that arrangements were being made for providing him with an outlet. The Collector, however, refused to recommend the acquisition of a plot of land for the purpose of providing the outlet, and informed the claimant that since the Railway Company were arranging to acquire the bungalow and its compound there would be no necessity for constructing a road. He wrote again to the claimant informing him that the Railway Company had preferred acquiring his bungalow and outhouses to providing him with a metalled approach road. After this, a Government notification was published declaring that the claimant's plot, with the superstructure thereon was required for a public purpose, namely for the Railway Company. It was eventually acquired and on the case coming up before me, the claimant's pleader argued that this notification was illegal and ultra vires and that any acquisition of the claimant's bungalow and compound on the ground that it was more costly in the eye of the company to provide an access thereto in place of one removed by their own act was neither an honest nor a legal exercise of the powers conferred by the Land Acquisition Act. I had, with great regret, to disallow this argument, in view of the clear provisions of section 6 of the Act, though I felt no doubt after reading the correspondence between the claimant and the Railway Company that the acquisition of the bungalow was decided upon because it was considered preferable and cheaper to providing an access to which the Railway were bound under the terms of the first award."

This is what the officials themselves have to say upon the subject. Now I propose, Sir, to take you to the Madras Presidency and show you what is being done in certain parts of that Presidency in the matter of assigning house-sites. The power of acquiring land to be assigned as house-sites was introduced for the first time in the Act of 1894 after a good deal of opposition and discussion, and it was only by a narrow majority that that point was carried. Recently the Madras Government issued orders that land should, whenever necessary, be compulsorily acquired to be granted as house-sites to the members of the depressed classes who generally possess no houses of their own. The cost of the acquisition is to be borne by the Government in the first instance and to be recovered from the assignees in easy annual instalments—15 or 20 I suppose. This is done in pursuance of the policy of Government of ameliorating the condition of these unfortunate people. So far no objection can be properly taken to this policy. But see how it is worked in practice. I have got with me printed copies of memorials presented to the Government and the Legislative Council of Madras by Mr. T. Somasundaram Mudaliar—a landlord in the Tanjore district and a Member of the Madras Legislative Council, concerning the doings of the Labour Department in that district. The memorial states that the Assistant Labour Commissioner is overzealous and, contrary to the orders of Government, acquires land for assignment as house-sites to persons other than those of the labouring classes—i.e., to money-lenders, Government employees, mirasidars, merchants, persons who already own houses and even to persons who are not residents of the village in which the land is acquired. This allegation is supported by several annexures giving particulars of individual cases. One of these annexures states that one Maruthamuthu Naickar to whom a house-site is given in a certain village was not a resident of that village at all and that he owns a tiled house and wet and dry land in another village. The memorial further states that the principles laid down by Government that where Government land is available it should be utilized, and that the cheapest land available should be taken, are ignored. "Kandaswami Pillai of Ammanadapuram offered to give land at Re. 1 and this was not accepted and more costly lands the acquisition of which caused great hardship has been taken and the reason for such action is not apparent and the motive does not seem to be praiseworthy." I am quoting from the memorial. I know that some of the statements were controverted by the Labour Commissioner in the course of a debate in the Legislative Council, but the very fact that such a memorial is presented not by an irresponsible private person, but by a Member of the Legislative Council itself is very significant. Sir, the doings of the Labour Department in the Tanjore District have a family likeness to what they are doing in my own district of Godavari. Here also the Labour Department started with the idea of acquiring house-sites for the depressed classes only, but subsequently they extended it to other classes, chiefly to the community of toddy drawers locally known as Idigas. This class is by no means a depressed class. There are some very rich men among them in my own taluq of Amalapuram. My Honourable friend can support me in that respect.

Mr. T. E. Moir: (Madras: Nominated Official): I demur to being asked to support any of the Honourable Member's statements.

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu: Several of them own lands of their own and very many of them cultivate others' lands as tenants. As a rule these people live in their own houses and are certainly able to buy more land if required. Nevertheless, the Labour Department (for which my Honourable friend was responsible for some time) compulsorily acquire lands to be given to these people on the same terms as to the Panchamas. I have got with me a list of not less than 65 cases in which lands were assigned to people who already own houses, in my own village and the bulk of these lands are covered with valuable cocoanut topes and are worth a thousand rupees or more per acre. I am sure that few or none of these people to whom houses are granted would have applied for those lands if they had to pay the value of the lands in lump sum. They applied for the sites because they thought or they knew that they would get them almost for the asking. It would occur to most people to inquire why these people who are able to buy their own house-sites should be given sites acquired by Government compulsorily. Well, it is difficult, Sir, to answer that question by anything that I can adduce to the satisfaction of the House.

There is another aspect of this question, which I must bring to the notice of this House, and that is one of the principles on which the Labour Department seems to be acting in my district. In that part of the country we have got field servants, and generally every landholder gets one or more of his field servants to live on his own land in huts erected by the landholders at their cost. It is for the purpose of watching those lands. It is especially so in the case of cocoanut topes which require to be watched and guarded. It is usual to build huts in those topes and get one or more servants to live in them. They live in the huts for a number of years. Now, under the system of acquiring house-sites for the depressed classes, the Labour Department has, it appears, made it a rule to acquire the very sites on which these people are living. See how much hardship this must cause to the landlords. This must be a source of friction between the landholder and the man. I do not object if all these people are given sites in one locality, if you are forming a new village where all the people could live. But you employ a man on your own land as your servant and the Government says "We will acquire that piece of land and give it to him." See how inconvenient that is to the landholder.

Mr. Chairman: Does the Honourable Member not think he is travelling too far into details and unless they bear upon the principle he may omit them?

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu: I want to say that the present law affords no safeguards, no relief to the landholder in the matter of acquiring land. That is my point. I believe I have said enough on the subject that the law as it stands does not afford a satisfactory remedy against the improper acquisition of land. I shall then proceed with what I propose should be done to remedy that evil. Before that I propose to refer to the law of England on the matter of land acquisition. According to Halsbury's Laws of England there are three ways of acquiring compulsory powers over land:

- (1) by the passing of a public general Act;
- (2) by promoting a private Bill which, when passed, becomes a local and personal Act; and
- (3) by proceeding under existing Acts to obtain an order which is commonly referred to as a Provisional Order.

The last method approximates most to our law and it has been described thus:

"In order to save the expense and trouble of proceeding by private Bill to obtain compulsory powers to acquire land, Parliament has, in a number of public general Acts, provided simple methods of procedure. This procedure varies somewhat in the different Acts, but its principal characteristic is that an order conferring the powers is made by some person or body mentioned in the particular statute, which order however, is not operative until it has been confirmed in a manner provided in the general Act. Until that has taken place it is said to be provisional only; hence this method of obtaining compulsory powers is known as procedure by Provisional Order. The main features are alike in the different statutes. The first requisite is that the person or the body seeking the power should give ample notice of their intentions. This is done by advertisement in the local newspapers, in which full particulars are given, and by the service of notices on every owner, lessee or occupier, or reputed owner, lessee or occupier of the lands proposed to be taken. The next step is to petition the authorities who have the power to make the orders. This authority is usually one of the Government departments. The petition must give full particulars and be supported with evidence to show compliance with the provisions of the Act. If the authority are satisfied with that evidence, they will consider the petition, and if, in their view the matter should proceed, they direct that a local inquiry shall be held, at which all persons affected have an opportunity of being heard. The making of the Provisional Order empowering the petitioner to acquire the land follows if the authority are satisfied on the report of the person making the inquiry. It has next to be confirmed, and in the majority of cases, confirmation is obtained by the passing by Parliament of a Confirming Act, the Bill for which is usually submitted by the department making the order. In its passage through Parliament it is treated as a private Bill and owners of the land proposed to be taken or injuriously affected may oppose its passage before the Select Committee of both Houses."

Thus, you will see, Sir, that, under the English law, the owners of land which is proposed to be compulsorily acquired, have got ample opportunities of making their objections and having their objections inquired into and disposed of, whereas under our law there is no opportunity given to them at all for making any objection. What we have to consider, Sir, is how this defect can be removed. The procedure that I have proposed is that the owner of the land should be allowed to raise this point along with any other objection before the Collector during the inquiry that he makes prior to the making of the award, and that, failing to get satisfaction there, he must, as in the case of other objections, be allowed to ask the Collector to refer the matter to the Civil Court. I am aware that there is a great difference of opinion on this point, but non-official opinion is, as a rule . . .

Mr. Chairman: The Honourable Member must bring his remarks to a close.

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu: I find that non-official opinion is, as a rule, in favour of that procedure. I admit that official opinion is rather against it, and the opinion of the Judges, which I have carefully examined, is divided on that point; some of the Judges of the High Courts, who were consulted, are in favour of it and some are against it, but I admit, Sir, that the official opinion is against the making of any reference to the Civil Courts. This objection is based on three reasons. One is that the Government cannot possibly do anything wrong.

Mr. Chairman: I have allowed the Honourable Member sufficient latitude. I do not think he need go into so many details.

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu: Very well. I will not go into details. I recognise, Sir, that there is a good deal of official opposition to the matter going before a Civil Court, but the chief ground on which that objection is based is that it causes delay. Well, on reading all these opinions and also by virtue of my experience as an executive officer. I do admit that there is some force, Sir, in the argument that, if every case in which an objection is made should go before a Civil Court, there might be much delay. So, I, personally, Sir, am inclined to reconsider that point. I will remove that, subject to some other method of inquiry, but this is a matter which could be considered by the Select Committee. I, for one, would not raise any objection to that provision being taken away and some more speedy procedure being adopted. That, however, is a matter of detail. The principle underlying my Bill is that the owner of the land must be given an opportunity to raise an objection. That is the principle underlying my Bill. If the Government admit that principle, as they ought to admit, because there is such a strong official opinion in support of it, they ought not to oppose my motion which is only to refer the Bill to the Select Committee where the agency by which the objection should be heard can be determined. I therefore move my motion.

The Honourable Mr. B. N. Sarma (Revenue and Agriculture Member): Sir, it is clear from the speech of the Honourable Mover of this Bill that, having gone carefully through all the opinions which have been received, he sees that the main principle for which he has been fighting, namely, that there should be a remedy to a Civil Court open to the aggrieved party, is one that cannot be accepted, and he is therefore prepared to drop it for himself.

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu: Oh, no.

The Honourable Mr. B. N. Sarma: To drop that portion of the Bill. Honourable Members have had these opinions circulated and it is clear that all the Local Governments who have been consulted are clearly of opinion that the Bill is neither necessary nor desirable. The Government, it is true, have stated, and do state even now, that they have under consideration the question of amending the Land Acquisition Act, especially with regard to the recommendations made by the Industrial Commission. As to whether the Land Acquisition Act has to be amended or not is a subject on which the Government of India has been in correspondence with the Local Governments, whose replies have been received and the whole matter is being considered by the Government. We recognise that it may be, as has been pointed out by some of the Local Governments, that an opportunity may by means of a Statutory provision be given to the landholders or other persons whose lands may be acquired, to state their objections which at present they can state under various departmental rules. Such rules have been formulated by Bengal, Madras and other Provinces so that the Local Governments may have them always before them and consider them before they come to any decision in the matter. But that is entirely different from accepting the various principles for which my Honourable friend has been contending. It is clear from his statement that he has been largely influenced by the unhappy controversy which has been raging in some parts of the Madras Presidency during the last 2 years. It may be that some landholders feel aggrieved by the proceedings which have been taken for the acquisition of land to better the condition of the depressed classes. It may be that in individual cases the procedure has not been correct. I am not for a moment saying that it has not been correct; but to argue from a position due to temporary causes, where the Government, according to the Honourable Member himself, have been striving their level best to improve the depressed classes, and to say that the whole Act has to be revised in view of the experience which has been his unhappy lot to notice during the last few years, I think, is going too far. The Local Governments emphatically say that it would be absolutely unsafe to prolong these inquiries in the manner suggested in this Bill. Honourable Members who are lawyers will also remember that the Privy Council, in their latest judgment on the subject, have approved quite clearly and emphatically of the procedure under which the Government decide as to whether land acquisition is desirable in any particular instance or not. It is absolutely impossible to lay down categorically what is a public purpose. Nor does this Bill lay down what is a public purpose. If it is impossible to define what is a public purpose, what is the criterion which the Civil Court would have before it in coming to a decision as to whether the proceedings which have been taken are legal or illegal? The problem bristles with difficulties. The Act has been working fairly smoothly for the last 30 or 40 years (Honourable Members: "No, no.") excepting in one or two recent cases which have come into prominence in Bombay.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas (Bombay City: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Most glaring instances.

The Honourable Mr. B. N. Sarma: It may be, and it is in respect of those acquisitions for public companies and for industrial concerns as I have said already that the Government has legislation in contemplation; and Honourable Members may rest assured that it is the desire of Government to set this matter at rest so that a satisfactory solution may be reached from the public as well as the governmental point of view. The Government have no desire to acquire land for public companies and industrial concerns which would act as a hardship to the public at all. Therefore they do mean to provide a remedy and the necessary procedure is being evolved. But the Honourable Mr. Ramayya Pantulu asks us to agree to a measure under which all acquisition for a railway company, for a local board, for a municipality or for a proper Government purpose has to be brought before a civil court or any other tribunal and that the whole matter should be adjudicated upon before the proceedings are concluded. It would be impossible, I think, and it would be extremely costly to undertake any such inquiry whatsoever or to refer these matters to a civil court, and I think the Local Governments are perfectly right in stating that the procedure is one which cannot be acceptable to any Member of this Legislature. I venture to suggest that the remedy that is sought to be provided by this Bill is one which would lead to infinite difficulties, delays and excess cost, and is one which has not been accepted even in the United Kingdom. Even in the United Kingdom it is not the civil courts that adjudicate as regards the purpose. Here as I have already said the Industrial Commission has made certain recommendations as to whether acquisition for private companies and for industrial concerns could not be placed on a more satisfactory footing and that is a matter which is being considered; but this Bill does not confine its operation to merely industrial companies, but extends its purview to every act of acquisition for any public purpose, whether it be governmental, municipal, local or otherwise. Take the case of a railway company. Land has to be acquired in several districts; thousands of pieces of land have to be acquired. Well, are we to be told that a detailed inquiry of the sort adumbrated in this Bill would be possible or that any railway project would be feasible if all persons who object to particular patches of land being acquired are going to be given the liberty of going before a tribunal and questioning the legality and the equity of land acquisition? If A says that the railway need not run through his land and points out to B's land as the more appropriate one, notice will have to be given to B; the whole alignment will have to be changed. It would be impossible to do anything whatsoever if questions of that description are to be left to the determination of any court whatsoever or any tribunal which may be constituted for the purpose. So far as I am aware the only objections that have been raised in the past are with regard to the acquisitions for these industrial companies. I am not aware that the Government have been abusing their power in arbitrarily acquiring land for railway companies or for legitimate public purposes or local and municipal purposes. The whole of the machinery would come to a standstill, no project would be possible of completion if the elaborate machinery that is sought to be provided by this Bill is going to be accepted by this House. It would be extremely difficult, and we shall not know where we shall be. I therefore would suggest, Sir, that it would be impossible for Government to agree to the principle of this measure in so far as it asks that every question of this description should be arbitrated by a tribunal before the acquisition proceedings are concluded. But that does not mean that the Government do not realise the difficulties that have been pointed out. As has been observed by the Honourable Mover, some of the Local Governments themselves have suggested a slight modification whereby opportunities ought to be given to the public who may be affected by the proceedings under the Land Acquisition Act to state their case before the Government determines as to what has to be done. I think it is but fair that the persons who are affected should be allowed to have their say and that the Government should have all the proceedings before them before they come to any final decision: but once the Government come to a decision, I submit to the House that that decision should be final. It is not likely that they would tolerate any vexatious or malicious proceedings or that they would acquire land unnecessarily especially in these days when every grievance can be ventilated in a Council. I may further point out, Sir, that every project has to be brought before the Councils for financial sanction, and therefore there is a definite amount of control now exercised both by the Central Government as well as by the Provincial Governments in the matter of acquisition. It is not that there is no remedy whatsoever. I have already said that the Government, when they bring in a Bill to modify the provisions of the Land Acquisition Act for the purpose of acquiring land for industrial concerns or for private companies, and not merely for governmental purposes, would certainly sympathetically view the position that has been placed before the House to provide a machinery whereby individuals who may feel aggrieved should be able to state their case fully and inquiries made before the Government comes to a decision. I would therefore suggest to the Honourable Mover that he has achieved his purpose in bringing this grievance to the notice of Government and that he might withdraw his motion. It is impossible to proceed with the Bill as it is. The wording is imperfect; it is impossible to define what "public purpose" is. If it is impossible to define what "public purpose" is, it is impossible also for a civil or judicial tribunal which cannot exercise its discretion arbitrarily but must proceed upon well defined lines, to come to a proper decision. I therefore think, Sir, that this Bill has been misconceived and that the motion should be withdrawn by the Honourable Mover. If he does not, I must oppose it.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: I believe, Sir, that I shall not be doing justice to the wishes of my constituency if I do not speak on this question of the Land Acquisition Act while it is being discussed by this House. My Honourable friend, Mr. Sarma, has just pointed out that the Government themselves are considering the matter and probably in course of time they will themselves introduce a measure to amend the present Land Acquisition Act. I am very glad that the Government are going to do that, but I only hope that this desire on their part will soon materialise into action. If I am not mistaken, I think on one occasion, about a year ago it was perhaps, when a similar measure was introduced, the Government stated that they themselves desired to introduce legislation to amend this Act . . .

The Honourable Mr. B. N. Sarma: May I make a personal explanation, Sir? I have already said that on a distinct reference, apart from this Bill, which has been made by Government, all the Local Governments have now replied, that the matter is being examined by the various departments and would be ripe for an early decision. We hope to be able, therefore, to proceed with such measures as may be ultimately decided upon by the Government at an early date.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: Sir, I wish to emphasise the urgency of taking measures to amend the Land Acquisition Act at a very early date. I emphasise this fact particularly because this House I think is soon going to launch upon a policy of rapid industrialization so far as this country is concerned, and however anxious I am—and there can hardly be anyone who is more anxious than myself—that this country should adopt a policy that will encourage rapid industrialization, no one is more anxious than myself to avoid the dangers that will come into existence with the adoption of that policy. One of the dangers will be that the necessity of acquiring land will come into the forefront. We have had an instance in Bombay where a good deal of agitation has been created, and a righteous indignation was caused at the acquisition of land under the present Land Acquisition Act. I want to point out to the Government that if they are going to introduce a Bill to amend the Land Acquisition Act, they must see to it that as far as possible the Land Acquisition Act that will be introduced now will be in conformity with the Act such as obtains in England. My Honourable friend, Mr. Sarma, pointed out the difficulty of determining as to what. . . .

Mr. Chairman: I can only allow the Honourable Member an opportunity, if he desires, to discuss the principle of the present Bill, not the details of an intended Bill about which he has already made ample reference.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: I bow to your ruling, Sir. I am now discussing the principle. I only wish to say that there are safeguards in the English Act which do not exist under the present Land Acquisition Act here, and it is necessary that those safeguards should also be introduced into the Land Acquisition Act here, specially to determine the public purpose; the Legislatures of the country in the various provinces must be given a voice, a predominant voice in determining what is a public purpose and what is not a public purpose and the matter should not be left to the discretion of the executive. With regard to the other question as to who should determine the compensation and what should be the compensation, there, too, there are safeguards provided in the English Act which do not obtain here. Here, the man who notifies that a particular portion of land will be acquired, and the man who determines the amount of compensation, happens to be the same man. (Voices: "No, the Court.") Well, the Court comes in only when the matter is taken to the Court, but otherwise I think the Collector himself determines both. Well, my only point is this, that Government should try their best to bring the Act here in conformity with the English Act. That alone will be acceptable, I believe, to this country.

Mr. J. N. Mukherjee (Calcutta Suburbs: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Sir, as I have given some thought to this matter, I should like to detain the House with one or two observations with the object of removing certain impressions from the mind of the Government Benches. The first thing is that the Government is under the impression that it is only the industrial undertakings which necessitate some change in the view point of Government as regards acquisition. The case of the public is,—"No, when land is acquired by Government itself even for big undertakings, such as those for railway purposes, or canal purposes, as well as for other purposes, Government does so without taking into consideration the difficulties caused by its procedure as to compulsory acquisition, and often makes up its mind to acquire land even when it is not prepared with the money and means necessary for carrying out its project." I would detain the House for a longer time than I thought it necessary to do, at this late hour, if I were to cite instances of large acquisitions which have been lying uncompleted for 10, 12 or even 15 years, without Government being able to put them to any use whatever. On top of that what Government does is this; if plots are acquired on which there are some machinery and structures, costing say about five lakhs of rupees, the Deputy Collector of his own accord goes into some sort of arrangement and says to the owner of the plot, "I will acquire some other land and give this land to you, so that Government will not have to pay compensation." That is what is in my mind. So that if the Government wishes to improve the Act the improvement cannot be effected within these narrow limits indicated by the Honourable Member for Revenue and Agriculture.

Dr. H. S. Gour (Nagpur Division: Non-Muhammadan): I rise to a point of order. Is the promise of the Government under discussion by this House or the Bill moved by the Honourable Mr. Pantulu?

Mr. J. N. Mukherjee: The Bill is, Sir. It is proposed that the whole Bill should be rejected because there are two principles involved: one is the determination of the necessity for the acquisition and the reality of the purpose, and the other is the mode in which that purpose of the acquisition is to be achieved. As regards the last point I think Honourable Members of the House will agree that the civil court is not the proper place for these questions to be discussed and determined, and some other speedy method is required. What the public think is that it should not be left in the hands of one individual. There should be a Board in which the public have confidence for determining these questions as speedily as possible. The executive members of the Board may be officials and non-officials. (A Voice: "Educationists?") No, not educationists. They can be selected and various other questions which are incidental may be considered when the Bill is being considered. There is therefore not one point but several, but I will not detain the House by saying anything more. With these observations, Sir, I will resume my seat.

Mr. T. E. Moir: Sir, I greatly regret that I should have been drawn into the discussion on this Bill at all; and, strictly speaking, I suppose that the remarks I am going to make are irrelevant and if it is the ruling of the Chair that they are irrelevant, I am quite ready to submit to that ruling. But whatever view the House may take of this Bill, of the principles it contains, I do wish to protest against the manner in which Mr. Ramayya has brought in the Labour Department of Madras. I wish to protest against that being taken as relevant to his Bill or supporting it. His speech was presumably directed, or should have been directed to the principle of the Bill, not to making an attack on the Labour Department of the Madras Presidency. I should perhaps not have felt it necessary to intervene even on that score, but he further proceeded to point me out to the House as having been personally responsible for those enormities of which he stated that the Labour Department had been guilty. He not only did that, but he asked me to support him in bringing these charges against that Department of which after all the administration is the concern of the provincial Government; he asked me to support him in the allegations which he made against that Department. Now, the contributions of my Honourable friend to the debates in this House are generally marked by experience and knowledge and a freedom from prejudice. But I am afraid I cannot say that they have been marked by those attributes in this case, and I at any rate must refuse, in order to support his Bill, to blacken my own face and to sit on a stool of repentance.

I would turn now to what he has placed before the House as evidence in support of his Bill. He referred to the action which has been taken in respect of the depressed classes in Madras, and he said that that action had led to all sorts of irregularities, oppression and so on, which presumably his Bill, if it had been in existence, would have prevented. But he did not say why that policy to which he referred had been adopted by the Madras Government. Most Members of this House are aware that one of the greatest problems with which we are faced in the Madras Presidency is the position of the depressed classes, and may I say that it is not merely, as possibly members who come from the North of India may suppose, a social question. It is not a social stigma or social or religious disabilities. It is very largely an economic question—a question of economic disabilities. And the position in reference to the depressed classes in the districts to which my Honourable friend referred is that they are mainly agricultural labourers. Further, that for generations untold they have been practically bound to the soil

Mr. W. M. Hussanally (Sind: Muhammadan Rural): Sir, I must rise to a point of order. This speech justifies the action of the Labour Commissioner of Madras, with which we have nothing to do. I am afraid my Honourable friend is not speaking on the Bill. Whatever the arguments of Mr. Pantulu may have been, the question before us is whether the Bill is to be referred to a Select Committee or not. We have nothing to do with the actions of the Madras Government or the Labour Commissioner.

Dr. H. S. Gour: Sir, I also think that a side remark made by the Honourable Mover of this Bill cannot be made the pivot for a long discourse on that subject.

Mr. Chairman: I allowed the Honourable Mr. Moir to make a short reference to it, and I think, having done it, he will confine his remarks to the Bill. Now, I think he has sufficiently refuted the charge against the Labour Department.

Mr. T. E. Moir: Sir, I would merely say that my remarks are strictly relevant possibly not to the principles of the Bill but to remarks which were allowed and to arguments which were allowed to be adduced by the Honourable Mover of the Bill. But I of course bow to your decision, Sir, and I say nothing more. I should have liked, if I had been permitted, to explain how entirely wrong an idea the Honourable Member

Dr. H. S. Gour: I rise to a point of order. If one Honourable Member makes some irrelevant remarks, does it justify another member making an irrelevant reply?

Mr. T. E. Moir: If I might rise to a point of order, Sir; if a Member of this House, who happens to be an official Member, is attacked in respect of his administration of a department in this House, is he to be attacked without a right to defend himself?

Mr. Chairman: Mr. Moir will resume his seat. I have already permitted Mr. Moir, having reference to the remarks made by Mr. Pantulu, to travel outside the régime of strict relevancy in order to give him an opportunity to refute the remarks. Having done that, I must call upon him to speak on the Bill.

Mr. T. E. Moir: Sir, I only rose in order to point out to the House that the so-called evidence adduced by the Honourable Member was not relevant

Mr. Chairman: The Honourable Member is still repeating the same remarks. If he is not going to speak on the Bill, he must close his speech.

Mr. T. E. Moir: And I have no desire, under the circumstances, to say anything further.

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu: In the first place, Sir, I must say that I never meant to attack my Honourable friend, Mr. Moir. I never meant to ask him, Sir, to support all that I said. All that I wanted his support for was

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri (Central Provinces Hindi Divisions: Non-Muhammadan): Is that relevant, Sir?

Mr. Chairman: The Honourable Member will proceed to reply to any remarks made on the Bill.

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu: The Honourable the Revenue Member said there was no necessity for this Bill, as the present Act was working smoothly. Well, Sir, it is not working at all smoothly. Several instances of hardship under the Act have recently come to the notice of the public, but the fact that more instances have not come to our notice is because of section 6 of the Act, which acts as a guillotine and does not allow these objections to be raised before the Court. If that was not the case there would be hundreds of cases of hardship brought before the Courts and reported in the newspapers and in the law reports. It is because this section acts as a closure that the world does not hear much more of these cases.

The Honourable the Revenue Member also said that the Government proposes to do something in regard to the acquisition of land for companies. But is it only in the case of the acquisition of land on behalf of companies that hardship is caused? You will find it is caused not only in connection with acquisition on behalf of companies, but also by Government. I have quoted the remarks of the Consulting Surveyor to the Government of Bombay, who says that wherever he travels he hears objections on all sides to the acquisition of land made by Government. If the remedy that Government is going to provide is to be confined to cases of acquisitions on behalf of companies, it will be a most inadequate provision. There ought to be provision made in regard to the acquisitions of land on behalf of the Government, the Local Board or the Municipality or companies.

The Honourable Mr. B. N. Sarma: I have said that the question whether the public ought to be given an opportunity, when they are aggrieved, to state their case so that the Local Government may have all the materials before them, will not be confined to industrial companies but will include all acquisitions. With that assurance, I ask the Honourable Member to withdraw.

Mr. J. Ramayya Pantulu: The Honourable the Revenue Member said that the Legislative Councils have even now control in the matter of acquisition. What control have they? They may have control in regard to sanctioning a certain sum of money for a certain object, that is all they have. They have absolutely no control in regard to the acquisition of land.

That does not come before the Councils, it is all done by the officers of Government.

The bulk of the Honourable the Revenue Member's speech was devoted to showing that, if every one of the cases where there was an objection were referred to a civil court, there would be an enormous delay. I quite understand that references to court are likely to cause delay, but that is a point which can be remedied. It is quite open to the Select Committee to remove that portion of the Bill and substitute a less costly and more expeditious method of hearing and disposing of petitions. That is a matter which I think can be gone into by the Select Committee. Therefore there is no merit in dwelling too much upon a point of detail which could be remedied in the Select Committee. I, therefore, think that the Bill ought to go to the Select Committee where it can be altered into a form which will be suitable for all purposes.

Mr. Chairman: The question is :

"That the Bill further to amend the Land Acquisition Act, 1894, be referred to a Select Committee consisting of Mr. N. M. Samarth, Mr. J. N. Mukherjee, Mr. W. M. Hussanally, Sardar Bahadur Gajjan Singh, Mr. B. Venkatapatiraju, Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas, Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar, Rai T. P. Mukherjee Bahadur, Mr. J. Hullah and the Mover."

The motion was negatived.

The Assembly then adjourned till Eleven of the Clock on Friday, the 16th February, 1923.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.

Friday, 16th February, 1923.

The Assembly met in the Assembly Chamber at Eleven of the Clock.
Mr. President was in the Chair.

MEMBER SWORN:

Mr. A. V. V. Aiyar, C.I.E., M.L.A. (Finance Department: Nominated Official).

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

PETROL CHARGES.

352. Mr. R. A. Spence: Are Government aware that there is widespread discontent at the high charge for petrol levied by the Companies controlling the oil fields of India and Burma and that India is not receiving any benefit as she ought to do from what may be termed a local industry of her own products?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: The attention of Government has been drawn to statements to this effect in the public press.

BURMA OIL COMPANIES' CHARGES FOR PETROL.

353. Mr. R. A. Spence: Are Government aware that the retail sale price of Burma petrol in England is only two shillings per gallon, equal to 24 annas currency, whereas in Bombay the price is 32 annas and in Calcutta 30 annas per gallon and that, even allowing for the special War tax of six annas, the Oil Companies in Burma obtain more for their petrol from the India public than from foreign export in spite of heavy freight charges to Europe?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: The prices are believed to be as stated.

Sir Montagu Webb: Arising out of that answer, Sir, may I ask if Government contemplate taking any steps to secure to consumers in India the full benefits which may be expected reasonably to arise from the existence of local oil-fields?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: May I ask what steps the Honourable Member contemplates?

RETAIL PRICE OF PETROL.

354. Mr. R. A. Spence: Will Government state the approximate retail price of petrol to the public in India and Burma for each year from 1916 to 1922, and what reduction, if any, has been allowed on Government purchases?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: The present retail price of petrol is 1-14 per gallon in Calcutta and from 1-10 to 1-12 in Rangoon. Information as to prices in preceding years is not available. Petrol supplied direct to the military authorities is exempt from the usual excise duty, but no reduction in price is allowed by oil companies on such purchases.

Dr. H. S. Gour: May I ask the Honourable Member what is the cost price of petrol in India?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: I have no information on that point.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: What is the price of petrol per gallon in Delhi?

IMPORT OF BURMA PETROL INTO INDIA.

355. Mr. R. A. Spence: What has been the import in gallons of Burma petrol into India during the first 9 months of the fiscal year 1922-23, and the export to other countries over a like period?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: Returns of coastal trade are not published monthly and therefore figures showing the quantity of petrol imported from Burma into India during the first 9 months of the current fiscal year are not readily available. The export from Burma to other countries during the same period amounted to 12,872 thousand gallons.

PETROL IMPORTATION.

356. Mr. R. A. Spence: Is any petrol other than from Burma imported into British India and if so, what was the quantity in gallons for the year 1921-22?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: Small quantities of petrol are imported into British India from foreign countries such as the United Kingdom, Ceylon, Straits Settlements and the United States of America. Such imports amounted to 1,348 gallons in 1921-22.

Sir Montagu Webb: Does Government recognise, in view of this reply, that there obviously exists a combination to maintain prices in India at an artificially high level?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: No, Sir.

WAR TAX ON PETROL.

357. Mr. R. A. Spence: (1) What was the amount of revenue realized from the War tax of six annas per gallon on petrol during the fiscal year 1921-22 and the quantity in gallons exported to other countries?

(2) Now that the War has been officially declared to have ended, has Government considered the expediency of removing this special War tax and in place thereof levying a reduced excise duty on all petrol produced in India and Burma both for export and local consumption which, while not necessarily reducing the revenue, should have the effect of reducing the sale price in India and Burma and thereby assisting the expansion of motor transport?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: (1) The excise duty levied on petrol during the fiscal year 1921-22, amounted to Rs. 69½ lakhs. The quantity of petrol exported to other countries during the same period amounted to a little over 20 million gallons.

(2) The Government of India thank the Honourable Member for his suggestion but he will realise that it is quite impossible for me to anticipate in any way the Budget speech of my Honourable colleague, the Finance Member.

Sir Montagu Webb: May I take it from the Honourable Member's replies that Government feel that there are no means at their disposal by which these artificially high prices can be controlled?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: The Honourable Member must give me notice of questions of that kind.

UNSTARRED QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

SALARIES PAID ON RAILWAYS.

173. Mukhdum Sayad Rajan Baksh Shah: Will the Government be pleased to state the total amount paid as salaries to the staff (superior and inferior) of the Indian Railways as below:

- (1) Amount paid to Europeans and Anglo-Indians and Indian Christians.
- (2) Amount paid to Mohammadans, Hindus, Sikhs and others respectively?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: The information in the detail asked for is not available. It can be collected only by special compilations by the different railways and the Government are reluctant to put Railway Administrations to this trouble.

EXPENDITURE ON PERSONS UNABLE TO EARN THEIR LIVELIHOOD.

174. Mukhdum Sayad Rajan Baksh Shah: (a) According to the last census of India what is the total number of persons in each province who on account of being blind, lame, dumb and crippled are unable to earn their livelihood?

(b) Whether such persons are given any aid from Imperial Revenues and if so, what is the total amount spent on this account. The information may please be given separately for Christians and non-Christians and under non-Christians, figures for Hindus and Mohammadans and Sikhs should be given separately?

The Honourable Mr. A. C. Chatterjee: (a) The number of persons returned at the last census of India as blind or deaf-mute is given in the attached statement. No statistics regarding lame or crippled persons are available.

(b) No special contribution is made by the Government of India to Local Governments but the latter no doubt make provision themselves.

In the case of areas directly under the administrative control of the Government of India allotments are made annually, but it is left entirely to the discretion of the heads of minor administrations to spend the money in the most suitable and useful manner. The budget provision on this account for the current financial year amounts to Rs. 28,380 in all. It is impossible to give information separately for Christians and non-Christians or for Hindus, Muhamminadans and Sikhs.

EXPENDITURE ON RELIGIOUS BUILDINGS.

175. Mukhdum Sayad Rajan Baksh Shah: Will the Government please state whether:

- (i) Government grants are given for building of churches of all Christian sects (Roman Catholic, Protestant and others) and their Bishops are paid anything as a stipend from Government, if so, please state what is the total amount spent on this account;
- (ii) Whether any similar building grants are paid for erection of mosques, temples and Gurdwaras and whether the Imams of mosques and Pandits and Mahants of Gurdwaras are paid some stipends from Government, if so, what is the total amount spent on this account?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: (i) Under certain conditions Government provides for or makes contributions towards the construction of Protestant and Roman Catholic Churches. The Anglican Bishops of Calcutta, Madras and Bombay alone receive full stipends from Government while the Anglican Bishops of Lucknow, Lahore, Rangoon and Nagpur receive from Government revenues the pay of senior chaplains. The total amount spent on Ecclesiastical buildings including churches, cemeteries and parsonages during 1920-21 (the latest year for which figures are available) was Rs. 2,50,769. About Rs. 1,22,371 are at present expended by Government on the salaries of the Bishops of Calcutta, Madras, Bombay, Lucknow, Lahore, Rangoon and Nagpur.

(ii) The Honourable Member is referred to the reply given to his question on the same subject No. 330 on the 5th September 1921. As then stated non-Christian places of worship have been and are financially assisted by the State through grants of land and alienations of land revenue made for religious purposes and to some extent through expenditure for archaeological purposes. The amount so spent cannot be stated but is undoubtedly very large.

EXPENDITURE ON FAMILIES OF SOLDIERS KILLED DURING THE WAR.

176. Mukhdum Sayad Rajan Baksh Shah: What was the total number of Indian soldiers and others who were killed during the last great war? The information may please be given separately for Hindus, Mohammadans, Sikhs and Christians and it may be stated how much is spent annually from Imperial Revenues towards the maintenance of the bereaved families of deceased persons of each class?

Mr. E. Burdon: The total number of Indian soldiers and other military ranks who lost their lives during the Great War, from all causes, is 58,946. The Government of India regret it is not possible to state how many of this number were Hindus, Mohammadans, etc.

To collect the information desired by the Honourable Member in the second half of his question, it would be necessary to require all Controllers of Military Accounts to undertake a special and most laborious compilation which, in the opinion of Government, would not be justified by the result. The information cannot for this reason be furnished.

DEATHS OF BRITISH AND INDIAN SOLDIERS IN GERMAN EAST AFRICA.

177. Mukhdum Sayad Rajan Baksh Shah: Will the Government be pleased to state what was the total number in British forces who conquered

German East Africa from Germans during the Great War, and how many of them were Indians; what was the total number of men who were killed in the German East Africa war and how many of them were Indians?

Mr. E. Burdon: The total strength of the British forces which were engaged in German East Africa during the Great War is not known to Government. A statement giving the number of Indian personnel, combatant and non-combatant, despatched to East Africa during the years 1914-1918 is laid on the table.

To the second part of the question, the answer is that the total number of men killed amongst the troops sent from India was 1,654, of whom 1,497 were Indians. The Government of India have no information as to the total number killed amongst all the troops that were engaged in East Africa.

Statement showing the number of Indian personnel, combatant and non-combatant despatched to East Africa during the years 1914-1918.

Combatants—

Indian officers and warrant officers	825
Indian other ranks	33,633
Non-combatants	12,447
TOTAL	46,905

LEGAL RIGHTS OF INDIANS IN KENYA

178. Mukhdum Sayad Rajan Baksh Shah: Will the Government please say whether in connection with the present disputes in Kenya (East Africa), the Government has had some correspondence with Nairobi and the Imperial Government, about the legal rights of the Indians? If so, will the Government kindly lay that correspondence on the table?

Mr. J. Hullah: The reply to the first part of the question is in the affirmative. Government do not think it advisable to lay the correspondence on the table.

The Honourable Member is, however, referred to the answers given by me on the 15th and 20th January 1923 to questions asked by Messrs. Jamnadas Dwarkadas and Seshagiri Ayyar, and also to the announcement made by me on the 30th January 1923 relating to the postponement of the general election in Kenya.

HAJ PILGRIMAGE.

179. Mukhdum Sayad Rajan Baksh Shah: Will the Government be pleased to lay on the table the following information:

- (a) Number of Haj pilgrims who left India for Haj during the years 1910 to 1913 and 1919 to 1922.
- (b) In case of fall in the number of such pilgrims during the years 1919 to 1922, the reasons for the decrease may please be stated?

The Honourable Mr. A. C. Chatterjee: (a) The numbers were 73,878 and 57,614, respectively.

(b) The number of pilgrims has always been liable to marked fluctuations. Government have no special information as to the reasons for the decrease.

INDIANS IN MARINE AND AIR FORCES.

180. Mukhdum Sayad Rajan Baksh Shah: Will the Government please say whether efforts are being made to recruit Indians in the commissioned ranks of the Marine and Air forces, so that the Indians should have opportunity to qualify themselves for the marine and air militia similarly as fixed number of commissioned posts have been reserved in the inland military forces?

Mr. E. Burdon: The question of rendering Indians eligible for commissions in the Royal Air Force is under consideration. Indians are not eligible for such commissions at present.

Indians are already eligible for commissions in the Royal Indian Marine. A committee to examine, amongst other things, the question of recruiting Indians as officers in the Royal Indian Marine has been appointed under the Resolution moved on the 12th January 1922 by Sir P. S. Sivaswamy Aiyer in the Legislative Assembly and accepted by Government, and the Committee is about to commence its inquiries.

INDIAN MILITARY COLLEGES.

181. Mukhdum Sayad Rajan Baksh Shah: Will the Government please quote the number and localities of colleges for military training in British India worked on the lines of such colleges in England, and state how many Indian students are reading in these colleges?

Mr. E. Burdon: The only college of the kind at present in existence in India is the Prince of Wales's Royal Indian Military College, Delhra Dun. The number of students now at this College is 50.

MOSQUES IN DELHI.

182. Mukhdum Sayad Rajan Baksh Shah: (a) Has the letter published on page 7 of the Muslim Outlook, Lahore, dated 28th January 1923, describing the pitiable condition of the mosques at Delhi, been brought to the notice of the Government?

(b) If so, whether any action has been taken to redress the Muslim grievances; if not,

(c) Will the Government kindly take necessary steps to secure that the mosques mentioned in the letter receive the same attention as the places of worship of other communities referred to therein?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: (a) Yes.

(b) and (c) The Honourable Member's attention is invited to the statement I made in the House on 6th instant in reply to Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar.

ARMS RULE COMMITTEE'S REPORT.

183. Mr. Ahmad Baksh: (a) When is the Government going to give effect to the report of the Arms Rule Committee?

(b) Has the Government agreed on any point of the minute of dissent to the Report? If so, on what points?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: I hope very shortly to be in a position to make a statement on the subject.

SALARY AND PENSION OF HIGH COMMISSIONER FOR INDIA.

The Honourable Mr. O. A. Innes: May I take this opportunity, Sir, of correcting a misstatement which I inadvertently made in replying to a question by Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar the other day. Mr. Ayyar asked me whether Sir William Meyer, the late High Commissioner, drew his pension in addition to his salary as High Commissioner. Acting on the information supplied to me, I replied in the negative; but being not quite satisfied I cabled Home to the High Commissioner for information and I find Sir William Meyer did draw his pension in addition to his pay as High Commissioner.

MESSAGE FROM THE COUNCIL OF STATE.

Secretary of the Assembly: Sir, a Message has been received from the Secretary of the Council of State, which runs as follows:

"I am directed to inform you that the Council of State has, at its meeting held on the 15th February, agreed without any amendment to the following Bills which have been passed by the Legislative Assembly:

- 1. A Bill to supplement the Malabar Completion of Trials Act, 1922.*
 - 2. A Bill to amend and consolidate the law relating to the regulation and inspection of Mines.*
 - 3. A Bill to consolidate and amend the law relating to steam boilers."*

RESOLUTION RE ADOPTION OF A POLICY OF PROTECTION.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas (Bombay City: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Sir, I rise to move the Resolution that stands in my name on the agenda paper. It runs thus:

"This Assembly recommends to the Governor General in Council that a policy of Protection be adopted as the one best suited to the interests of India, its application being regulated from time to time by such discrimination as may be considered necessary by the Government of India with the consent and approval of the Indian Legislature."

I need scarcely say, Sir, that this is one of the most momentous questions that have come before this House for obtaining the decision of the House upon. The decision that the House will give on this most vital question will, I need scarcely say, affect the future of India. This question has been before the Indian public ever since the advent of British rule in India and the House is also aware that respected Indian publicists, most of whom have now passed away and some of whom are still with us, have spoken in clear and unmistakeable terms as to the policy that India should adopt on this question. Unfortunately, situated as we were in those days, neither the opinion of Indian leaders or the Indian public, nor the opinion of the Government of India, even as it was then constituted, were paid attention to by those who were in authority in England. The fiscal policy for this country was dictated not by the Government of India in this country nor by the people of this country as represented in the Legislatures of this country but by the Secretary of State, and that, not even in the interests of this country but in other interests. Ever since the inception of British rule in this country leader after leader has spoken unmistakably on the question of India having the right to decide its own fiscal policy and most of the Indian leaders have condemned the policy of free trade forced on this country, a policy which was dictated by interests other than our own. You find, for instance, Mr. Gokhale calling the fiscal policy that was forced on this country "the darkest spot in the administration of India." You find men like Romesh Chunder Dutt condemning the policy which was largely in the interests of other countries than India. You find men like Ranade condemning the policy of forcing free trade on this country which brought about the economic poverty and the misery of the masses of this country. Time after time, not only outside the Legislatures, but even in the Legislatures the question was brought forward by Indian Members of the Councils asking for a voice on the part of the Government of India and the Indian Legislature in the determination of the policy that was best suited to this country. Unfortunately for this country the cry of the Indian leaders—and if I may add also, of the Government of India—was a cry in the wilderness. You will remember, Sir, and I am sure this House will remember that even in the earlier periods when the struggle between this country and Lancashire was going on in the Legislature itself, Members of the Government of India openly declared that the policy which was being forced on this country was not at all in the interests of this country and we were unfortunate enough to be compelled to continue a policy which was not of our seeking, which was not in our interest, but which was forced on us by other interests. Finally the cry of the Indian Legislatures and of the people of India culminated in the appointment of the Industrial Commission to find out whether or not there were possibilities in the country for industrial development. Even then, as the power to dictate the policy was in the hands of the Secretary of State and not with the Government of India, the question of the fiscal policy best suited to this country was precluded from the deliberations of the Industrial Commission. Mr. Montagu and Lord Chelmsford then instituted an inquiry into the political problem in India and we find in their Report that it is clearly stated that they believed that one of the greatest grievances of India was that they had no voice in determining their fiscal policy and that they were forced to adopt a policy which was not in their interests. As a result of the inquiry instituted by the late Secretary of State and Lord Chelmsford and as a result of their deliberations the Joint Parliamentary Committee made a recommendation in which it clearly stated that in future, after the introduction of the Reform Act of 1919, all questions of fiscal policy should be determined by the Government of India in consultation with the Indian Legislature; and in cases where the Government of India and the Indian Legislature were in agreement the Secretary should cease to interfere. It was in accordance with this recommendation that the demand for an inquiry into the best policy suitable for this country was renewed here and ultimately a Commission was appointed to conduct that inquiry. We are here to-day to discuss the recommendations made by that Commission and to decide as to whether we should adopt the recommendations made unanimously by the Commission or whether we should continue to bless the policy which has brought about serious consequences in this country, which has brought about a state of economic dependence incomparable in the annals of the history of the world. India had once the reputation of being one of the richest countries in the world. To-day, as the House knows, it has the reputation of being one of the poorest countries in the world. Its dependence to-day is almost entirely, on land; and in years of famine especially, one feels in the words of Lord Curzon that

"the resisting power of the people is practically nil." The Fiscal Commission has made recommendations. I do not want to go for the moment into the differences that exist between the Report that is signed by all the members of the Commission and the views laid down in the note of dissent that has been recorded by the minority. Because, although one feels that there are some points on which a difference exists it cannot be denied and I am sure my Honourable colleagues on the Fiscal Commission here will bear me out when I say that so far as the fundamental question is concerned the Commission has come to a unanimous conclusion. I may also be permitted to say that in my opinion a few of my colleagues started with a bias in favour of a policy of free trade and after the examination of witnesses, after a perusal of the written evidence that was submitted to us, and after the deliberations that were carried on in our meetings, they came to the conclusion that, all said and done, the policy of protection was best suited to the interests of this country. It is to the credit, I think, of the Members of this House that even on this Commission, where members of both the Indian community and the European community worked together, not much difficulty was felt in deliberating this question of vital importance, round which so many controversies have raged in the past and that so far as the fundamental conclusion is concerned we were practically unanimous. The Commission has recommended that the policy of protection is best suited for this country and that this policy of protection should be applied with discrimination. The Commission examined the economic situation that exists in this country. The Commission found that the dependence of the mass of the people was too much on hand. The Commission found also that the argument that if India went in for industrial development, it would be at the cost of agriculture, had no force in it, because the population that could be drawn for the purpose of industrial development assuming even that industrialisation went on at a very rapid pace, would not be so large as to affect the work of the agricultural population in any way, that considering that more men were now engaged in agriculture than it was necessary or wise for them to do, it would be a help to the agricultural population if members of their families devoted themselves to the work of industrial development in this country. Not only that. But the Commission also found that if a policy of protection were adopted, and if as a result of it the wealth that is now drawn away from the country would remain in the country, the country would be the richer for that, the country would then have better resources at its disposal to be used towards the furtherance of the irrigation policy which would ultimately go to increase the prosperity of the agricultural population. Incidentally the Commission found also that, apart from being a hindrance to the agricultural population, a policy of industrialisation would go a great way in placing at the disposal of the country resources which could be used for the furtherance of the agricultural policy of this country; for, the object of the policy of protection and thereby encouraging industries in this country is mainly to keep the wealth of the country in the country itself. The wealth that is now being drawn away from the country by the necessity of importing from foreign countries manufactured articles and exporting from here raw materials which could be very well used for producing manufactured articles at much cheaper rates if a policy of industrialisation was adopted will remain in the country which would be the richer for that. At present what happens is that most of our manufactured articles are imported from foreign countries. Many of these articles are produced out of the raw materials that are exported from this country. The raw materials are the real wealth of the country, but the use of this real wealth of the country is made not by this country but by other countries, for these raw materials are sent back to this country in another shape; only the country has to pay a much larger price for these articles than the price the country received for the raw materials out of which these articles were manufactured and sent here. If we could by adopting a policy of reasoned protection encourage the industrial development of this country, we could make use of these raw materials here so as to save us all extra cost that we pay for the manufactured articles that are imported. We found that the only remedy for solving the economic problem of this country was to go in for a bold policy of industrialisation so as to keep the wealth of the country in the country itself and not to allow foreign countries to take the benefit of the abundance of raw materials and other conditions that are favourable to industrialisation which exist in this country. It is a fact, Sir, that India possesses a natural genius for industrial development, for, all those who have studied the ancient history of this country know full well that this country had never depended entirely on agriculture, that there were times when the industries of this country prospered, that there were times when the articles manufactured in this country were not only used by this country itself but were even exported outside this country. I admit that the invention of machinery was probably the first reason that hurt our trade outside this country, but to say that this country does not possess an industrial genius, which is the sine qua non of industrial development, is to show a complete ignorance of the facts of history. That this country possesses a natural industrial genius, and that it is rich in raw materials and other natural resources cannot be denied by any one who has studied even the Report of the Industrial Commission. That the country has also a large labour supply is a fact which is beyond question. As a matter of fact, I feel that it contains such a large labour supply that even if the attention of a fraction of our population was diverted by a policy of industrialisation to work in factories, it would bring about very good results indeed.

Another argument that has very often been used is that the capital of this country is shy. Now I admit that to a certain extent that argument does hold water. But why has the capital of this country been shy? Honourable Members will realise that the capital of this country has been shy not because that the people were not willing to invest in industrial enterprises, but because they had no confidence in the policy of the powers that be, because the policy that they dictated was not in the best interests of this country but it was in the interests of other countries. Just consider for a moment what the situation was when a natural protection was afforded during the war. Was the capital of the country then shy? Has it not been the experience of all of us that in those days when an opportunity was offered by a natural protection given to this country by the war that capital could easily flow wherever there was need for starting industrial concerns? And if a stable policy and a more steady policy in the interests of this country were decided upon by the Government of this country, then I have not the slightest doubt in my mind, and I am sure Honourable Members will have no doubt whatsoever, that it will not be a difficult proposition to induce the people of this country to allow their capital to flow for the purpose of promoting industrial concerns. But apart from that, I am not one of those who shut out the possibilities of allowing foreign capital in this country for the purpose of helping the industries of this country. Under certain limitations imposed as a consequence of the concessions made in their favour by a tariff protection and other forms of protection, I should certainly welcome foreign capital to flow into this country for the purpose of building up the industries of this country. But I repeat that I would allow it only under certain limitations imposed by Government. So far as the question of concessions, licences, monopolies, contracts is concerned, the Government themselves have declared the policy of imposing certain limitations on foreign capital. I shall go a step further and impose those limitations even in the case of industries which are started and which are given tariff protection. But that is a matter of detail. My point is that every possible advantage that a country can possess for the purpose of industrial development exists in this country. All that is needed is to give an impetus by means of a policy of protection which will stimulate the people of this country to go in more and more for industry to the ultimate advantage of this country itself. Now, we have, therefore, recommended a policy of protection to be adopted by this country. But we were not blind to the dangers that necessarily accompany the adoption of such a policy. We had the opportunity to see that no country that can boast to-day of having industrially advanced has reached its present stage without at one time or another of its industrial development adopting a policy of protection. Look at Germany, look at America. We do not want to copy the example of the United States of America. The tariffs are too high there, I admit. But look at Germany. Look at England itself, which has risen from a policy of protection to be a free trade country when it was able to stand on its own legs and hold its own against other countries. But, even to-day, those of us that have read the discussions in the House of Commons on the safeguarding of Industries Act and the debate on the dye-stuff question, know full well that the policy of protection is still being resorted to by England where its interests conflict with the interests of other nations. Take the example of Japan. Mr. Montagu and Lord Chelmsford pointed out in their report that India always holds up the example of Japan, which, in our own times and having started on its industrial development long after we established our factories here, has reached a stage of industrial development by which it holds its own against other nations of the world. What is that due to? A policy of protection. A policy in which the Government and the people combine for the furtherance of the interests of their country. We have then the example of other countries none of which has reached its present stage of industrial development without having resorted to the policy of protection at one time or another of its industrial development. But, as I said, we were alive to the dangers that would naturally accompany the adoption of such a policy and therefore we have provided safeguards in our recommendations which would minimise those dangers. For one has got to remember this, that, if this country after a period of continuance of the policy of free trade which has rendered it helpless and incomparably poor and miserable, if it adopted a policy of protection with a view to rapid industrialisation, although the ultimate gain to the country would be certain, the period of transition would be fraught with great dangers to this country, if proper safeguards were not provided in the recommendations of the Fiscal Commission. What would be the danger? The danger would be that it would unnecessarily raise the prices of articles of the necessities of life which ought to be made available to our poor countrymen at as cheap a rate as possible. Now, I admit that there is great force in this argument, and it is because I admit that, that, I think the Fiscal Commission has provided safeguards against it. Take our present revenue tariff. No one who knows anything about the present revenue tariff can deny that the tariff rates are not quite low, that the necessity of larger revenues for meeting the heavy military expenditure of the country has forced the hands of the Government to resort to high revenue tariffs which do tell, I admit, on the pockets of the poor people of the country. But what an unscientific and arbitrary system of revenue tariff you have at the present moment. If you can adopt a policy of protection and replace this present arbitrary unscientific system by a scientific tariff system which would bring into the coffers of Government the revenues that they require for their legitimate purposes and at the same time go a great way in helping the industries of this country, then, it seems to me that it would be futile to deny that that policy should be acceptable to the Government and the people of this country. I hold that, if proper discrimination in the selection of industries were exercised, if proper discrimination was exercised in considering the claims of each industry by means of establishing a Tariff Board, as recommended unanimously by the Fiscal Commission, it would not be difficult to evolve a policy of protection with discrimination which would bring about prosperous results for this country, reducing to the minimum the burden that in the transitional period the people might have to bear as a result of the adoption of that policy. No one denies that in order to rise from the position of helpless dependence on other countries for manufactured articles to a position of self-containedness, one must pay a price. We do wish that that price should be as small as possible, that it should be reduced to the minimum that it is possible for us to reduce it to, and it is for that purpose that we have recommended that that policy should be applied with discrimination. There is a small difference here between the majority and the minority. Both recommend that the policy should be applied with discrimination. Both recommend that a Tariff Board should be constituted with a view to investigating the claims of various industries as they come before us. Both say that due regard should be paid to the conditions that are indicated in paragraph 97 of the Fiscal Commission's Report. But, while the majority in my opinion insists that those conditions should be rigidly and for all time applied, the minority dissents there and says while these conditions may go on for the moment, it is not wise nor right to tie down the hands of the Tariff Board or of the Indian Legislature and the Government of India to a rigid and permanent application of these conditions. In the light of experience that we might gain in the course of a few years, it might be possible for us to say whether those conditions should be made more stringent; or as the minority think that the conditions should be less stringent when the people are prepared to bear a greater burden than they are at the present moment in a position to bear. It is no use, therefore, says the minority, to tie down the hands of the Government of India, the Tariff Board and the Indian Legislature to a rigid and permanent application of these conditions. But that is a matter of detail again. But so far as the policy of protection with discrimination is concerned, the Commission is unanimous on the point that that policy should be adopted by this country. There were other differences also between the majority and the minority. For instance, on the question of foreign capital, about which I have already spoken. The minority is anxious that the object with which protection is being adopted in this country should not be frustrated.

As a result of the recommendation made by the Joint Committee the Secretary of State has no longer that power, but the Government of India and the Indian Legislature now enjoy that power. The House will remember that in those old days Mr. Gokhale pointed out that he would have no hesitation in recommending a bold policy of protection if the application of that policy was in the hands of the Government of India itself. But, he said, as the situation stood then, it was entirely within the purview of the Secretary of State to direct the application of a policy of protection. In that case, he said, the danger would be that influential interests in the foreign countries would persuade the Secretary of State to give them all the benefit of the adoption of a policy of protection, thus perpetuating the grievance that we have, that the wealth of the country is driven in one form or other from this country to other countries. That danger no longer exists. As a result of the recommendation made by the Joint Committee the Secretary of State has no longer that power, but the Government of India and the Indian Legislature now enjoy that power.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar (Madras City: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Not yet entirely so.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: It was established by convention by the late Secretary of State when he refused to interfere at the request of the Manchester deputation with a conclusion that was reached by the Government of India and the Indian Legislature. I am sure the present Secretary of State will also respect that convention and respect the recommendation made by the Joint Committee. If it is not done, then I am afraid the policy laid down in the reforms will be futile and will create a good deal of suspicion in this country. I am not prepared for a moment to doubt the bona fides of the Secretary of State or of the Government of India so far as that policy is concerned. Now, the Government of India and the Indian Legislature will direct the application of that policy, and the danger that Mr. Gokhale thought existed then, no longer exists. But even then, if without imposing any limitations or any conditions we give the benefit of a policy of protection to foreign capital, we might probably be running into some danger of the wealth of this country being driven away into other countries as a result of the adoption of that policy. That is why on this question the minority would like to extend the application of those conditions which are accepted by the Government in certain instances also in the case of industries which are under tariff protection. Then there is another question dealt with by the Commission with which, for the present at any rate, we are not concerned, and that is the question of Imperial Preference. I am informed that a discussion on this subject, if at all it is raised, will be raised on a subsequent date. I am not concerned with that question for the moment at any rate. Then there is the question of excise. I don't think I need go into the question now.

Mr. President: No, I cannot allow the Honourable Member to go into that question.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: I am sorry, Sir, if I have exceeded the time limit. I shall try to bring my remarks to a close. With regard to export duties the Commission has laid down that export duties should not be encouraged and that the policy of having any export duties should not be adopted by Government and the Indian Legislature, for that policy hurts the interests of the growers. We were anxious to see if we could get further benefit of a policy of protection by imposing export duties but we have unanimously come to the conclusion after deliberation that that policy cannot but hurt the interests of the growers in this country and therefore, except in the case of a monopoly like jute, we have excluded from our recommendations the question of export duty, altogether. I have in the brief space of half an hour tried to place the case for protection . . .

(An Honourable Member: "Three-quarters of an hour".)

Mr. President: Order, order.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: I do not think so. I have tried to place the case for protection before the Honourable Members of this House. I have tried to be as fair as I possibly could. I have avoided all references to controversial questions because no useful purpose can be served by raking up memoirs of the past. I have only dealt with what the future is concerned and I believe that if we bury the dead past and decide to launch to-day upon a policy of reasoned protection which will help rapid industrialisation in this country, we shall have done a great service to the permanent interests of this country. Not only that. But having launched upon a policy of encouraging the growth of those industries which are considered the key and basic industries of this country as recommended by the Fiscal Commission, we shall have established in this country itself those resources which will be our real wealth for all time to come, and not only our wealth, but they will be of the greatest advantage to the Commonwealth in times of emergency. In the time of war the resources that exist will be of the greatest advantage to the Empire. So, a policy of reasoned protection applied with discrimination will not only further the interests of this country but will enable India to be a tower of strength to the British Commonwealth in times of difficulty. It is for the House to choose which policy it will adopt. The country has for years past demanded that a policy of protection alone could give rise to industrial concerns in this country and would help the establishment of industries in this country. It is for the House, as I say, now to decide. I should only like to remind the Government of India that the fear that the Secretary of State is likely to interfere must be allayed by them unmistakably and in clear language. Whatever be the policy, let that policy be decided not by anyone who is not in this country but by those who are competent to decide it, namely, the Government of India and the Indian Legislature. I am convinced that this policy is in the interests of the masses of the country. I am not here to plead for the interests of a particular class or of a particular province. I am here to plead for the interests of the country as a whole and I want Honourable Members to remember that nothing should be more dear to them than the interests of the country, that the country is greater than the classes or the masses, and that every policy that is in the interests of the country should be resorted to without any reference to any class. Let me concentrate on one result that will be achieved by the adoption of a policy of protection. That result is that your country as a whole will be enriched, that the wealth that is now drawn away from your country will ever remain in this country, that your people will be prosperous, that your people will be rich, that your people will be happy and they will be more serviceable not only to this country but to the rest of the world by attaining to that position. I leave it to the House again as I say to adopt any policy that they like. The Commission never wanted industrialisation to be built on the shaky foundations of the poverty of the poor and the tremendous wealth of the rich. The Commission wanted that industries in this country should be built up on the solid foundation of the simultaneous growth of the prosperity of the classes as well as of the mass of the agricultural population and the labour population. It is because of that that the Commission has provided all those safeguards that are necessary in the adoption of the policy of protection. I commend this Resolution to your vote. If the House decides that the policy of protection should be accepted, then I think it will be a red letter day in the history of this House; it will be a red letter day in the history of this country for, from a period of helpless poverty, we shall have taken a step which will ultimately enable us to reach a position of equality with other nations, of prosperity and happiness within our own country. Sir, I move the Resolution.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes (Commerce and Industries Member): Sir, I beg to move that for the original Resolution the following be substituted:

"That this Assembly recommends to the Governor General in Council:

- (a) that he accepts in principle the proposition that the fiscal policy of the Government of India may legitimately be directed towards fostering the development of industries in India;
- (b) that in the application of the above principle of protection, regard must be had to the financial needs of the country and to the present dependence of the Government of India on import, export and excise duties for a large part of its revenue;
- (c) that the principle should be applied with discrimination, with due regard to the well being of the community and subject to the safeguards suggested in paragraph 97 of the Report of the Fiscal Commission;
- (d) that in order that effect may be given to these recommendations, a Tariff Board should be constituted for a period not exceeding one year in the first instance, that such Tariff Board should be purely an investigating and advising body and should consist of not more than three members, one of whom should be a Government official, but with power, subject to the approval of the Government of India, to co-opt other members for particular inquiries."

Sir, may I begin with one preliminary remark? I do not propose to follow the example of Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas in his speech on the original Resolution. I do not propose in any way to go into the controversial history of the past. If this amendment means anything at all, I am sure that the House will see that it means the wiping of the slate, that it rests for us to decide what the new writing on that slate should be. I entirely agree with the remarks of Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas made at the end of his speech that instead of occupying ourselves with the dead past we should concentrate on the future. And let me add one more remark. I do not propose again to follow Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas's example and I do not propose in any way to range at large over the field of the Fiscal Commission's recommendations. My purpose here is to put two practical questions to the Assembly. I want first to get a principle accepted, and secondly, to concert with the House measures to make that principle effective, and that, Sir, is the whole purpose of my amendment.

In moving that amendment, the Government feel, as I am sure this House realises, a heavy sense of responsibility. I will discuss later the exact implications of the terms in which my amendment is couched. For the moment, the point I wish to emphasise is that this amendment marks an epoch in the fiscal history of India. Hitherto, traditionally, our tariff has been a revenue tariff. I am free to admit that in recent years the character of the tariff has undergone a change. In the last year or two, under the stress of our financial needs we have travelled far from our old policy of a light uniform duty on almost every class of import. Our general rate of duty is no longer light, and there have been breaches in the principle of uniformity. The general rate of duty is 15 per cent. ad valorem. On some classes of import the rate of duty is as high as 80 per cent. On other classes it is as low as 2½ per cent., and yet on other classes, there is no import duty at all. It is perfectly true that, as the Fiscal Commission has pointed out, in the framing of a tariff which contains such high rates of duty and such a wide variety of rates considerations other than those of pure revenue must have entered and I do not deny that they have entered, but the fact remains that the Government of India have never yet consciously adhered to the principle of protection as an integral part of its tariff policy. That is why I say that this amendment of mine marks a fundamental change of policy. For the first time, the Government of India ask the Legislature to agree to the proposition that their tariff policy may legitimately be directed towards fostering the development of industries in India. Some people in this House may think that we have hedged round the principle with too many reservations and too many safeguards. I will come to that point later. But what I say now is that in a matter of this kind, the all important thing is the admission of the principle. It is the first step that counts. As I said, the Government feel a very heavy sense of responsibility in asking the Legislature to take this step. We owe it to ourselves and to the country that I should give a brief explanation of the main considerations which have weighed with us in coming to so momentous a conclusion. But it is not my purpose to enter into any elaborate, any lengthy or any abstruse economic argument. That part of the case has been fully dealt with in the Fiscal Commission's report and I am content to leave it at that. My feeling is that this debate in the Assembly to-day will lose half its value if we attempt to deal with this vast and complex subject except on the broadest and most general lines.

Now, Sir, let me be quite frank. Some of us, Members of Government, have not come to the conclusion embodied in this amendment without deep searchings of heart and without forebodings. However authoritative the report of the Fiscal Commission may be, that report cannot and does not relieve the Government of its responsibility in the matter, and some of us cannot help feeling that there is cause for anxiety. If the result of our policy is that development of industries which we all have so much at heart, that is all to the good. But let us look at the other side of the shield. I am not concerned at present with the more obscure dangers which seem to be inherent in a policy of protection. I refer to the danger of political corruption and the danger of the formation of trusts. Nor am I concerned with the danger that the only result of our policy may be the fostering up in India of inefficient industries. But what I am concerned with is this. Whatever may be the merits of a policy of protection, I do not think that there is any one in this Assembly who can stand up and say that the argument is entirely predicated for the inception of that policy. It is no use blinking facts. We have to take into account the state of affairs as it exists in the world around us and outside us. Half that world has tumbled into ruin. It no longer exists as a customer, and that means that the remaining countries, especially those countries whose prosperity is bound up with their export trade, must fight more desperately than ever for the markets which still remain open to them. Moreover, in those countries, the potential productive industrial capacity has increased enormously owing to intensive reorganisation and extension during the War. Now those countries are faced with the spectre of unemployment. The manufacturers are fighting with their backs to the wall merely to keep their works open and their men employed. The workmen are accepting reductions in wages. Owners are foregoing profits. Shareholders are going without dividends, and vast reserves of inherited skill, aptitude and efficiency are being mobilised all to one end, namely, the bringing down of the cost of production. That is one side of the picture. It shows the sort of competition that India has got to meet,—better directed, more intense, more efficient,—economically than ever before. On the other side there is India. India has still to organise most of her industries; she is in most of her industries confronted with that most difficult and most protracted of all tasks, the training up of a force of skilled efficient operatives. While that task is in progress the cost of production must be high, and that means that however carefully we may discriminate, the measure of protection necessary to ensure the end in view cannot be small. And that again means that pro tanto our

12 Noon. policy of protection must increase the level of prices for the consumer generally and particularly for the agricultural and middle classes. There is no getting away from this fact. By discrimination we may mitigate the rise. But the fact remains, and it is so certain that I do not propose to argue it, that a policy of protection must mean an increase in prices in India. Now, I am well aware that many countries, most countries in fact, have gone in boldly for a policy of protection in spite of this disadvantage. But we are not considering the case of other countries. We are considering the case of India. We are not considering the case of countries with rich natural resources, with sparse or comparatively sparse populations and with a high standard of living like the United States of America and like Dominions such as Canada and Australia. People of countries like that can no doubt pay the inevitable price that protection demands. They can no doubt stand up to a high level of prices and a high level of taxation. But in India we have a country of 200 millions. Two-thirds of that population are agriculturists. Most of them are poor and the standard of comfort is low. One thing, I think, is certain. If the agricultural classes which form the bulk of the population in India were able fully to grasp the issues involved in this question of free trade versus protection, and if they were able fully to bring their influence to bear upon this Assembly, I doubt very much whether this Assembly to-day would accept my amendment. I doubt indeed whether I should be putting that amendment forward. The agricultural classes in every country in the world, I think I may say this with confidence, stand to gain the least and lose the most by a policy of protection. But even if we leave the agricultural classes out of consideration is there anyone in this House who can view without alarm, having regard to the conditions of India, the prospect of a substantial rise of prices following upon the development of a policy of protection. It is easy to speak of measuring prospective gain against immediate loss. It is easy to say that India must be prepared for a sacrifice. But surely the experience of the last few years has demonstrated even to the most unobservant the effect of high prices not only upon the public finances of India but also upon political, social and economic conditions throughout the country. Let this House remember that high prices have added to the wages bill for the Public Services in the last few years, 9 crores of rupees. Let this House remember that high prices created a period of industrial unrest with all the vast economic loss that a period of industrial unrest involves, from which period we are only just emerging. I am aware that Chapter V of the Fiscal Commission's Report deals with this point, but naturally it weighs with peculiar gravity upon us, who are responsible for the Government of India.

Nevertheless we are prepared to accept the considered conclusion of the Fiscal Commission that on the whole the right policy to adopt is a policy of discriminating protection. The first point I have to make is this. I do not suppose that there is any country in the world where this question of free trade or protection has been decided on purely economic grounds. Some of you may have read Mr. Percy Ashley's book "Modern Tariff History." In that book he points out that even Lists' great work in which he developed the theory of infant industries and argued the need for protection to enable a country to pass from a purely agricultural state to a mixed agricultural and industrial state owed the widespread approval it received in Germany less to its economic argument than to the great political appeal it made to the necessity of maintaining, completing and strengthening German nationality. There is the same sentiment at work in India. On the one hand India aspires to Dominion status, that is to say, she aspires to political independence within the Empire. On the other hand she aspires to economic independence. She hopes that within the Empire she may be economically independent. And behind this national feeling there is the pressure of a real economic grievance. Every impartial observer views with sympathy. I think, the difficulty which confronts every middle class parent in India in finding a career for his son. The Indian parent hopes that industrial development will increase the avenues of employment open to the educated Indian boy, and will open up more and more avenues which will bring that boy into contact with the hard practical realities of business life. Again the Government of India in the last few years has been doing its best to encourage industrial development, and we have long recognised that the introduction of the Reforms would mean a change in the fiscal policy of India. Lord Curzon gave public expression to this feeling in his speech in the debate in the House of Lords on the Government of India Bill, and it was with full knowledge of the trend of feeling in India that in 1921 we appointed the Indian Fiscal Commission. That Commission contained not only distinguished Indians but also distinguished Europeans. It contained three Presidents or past Presidents of important European Chambers of Commerce. It is quite true that there was a difference of opinion. There was a minority report as well as a majority report. But I am not concerned at present with the differences in the Commission. What I am concerned with is the fact that the Commission was unanimous in recommending that a policy of protection was the right policy for India. That, Sir, is a very remarkable fact and naturally it is a fact which has weighed very greatly with the Government of India. And finally as Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas has pointed out the issue to-day is not a clear cut issue between a policy of protection and a policy of free trade. The stress of events has forced our revenue tariff to a point where it is no longer a pure revenue tariff, and the choice that lies before us to-day is the choice between a tariff with arbitrary protective effects, irregular in its action and with no certainty of continuity, and an attempt to regularise the position by remodelling that tariff, in part at any rate, on frankly protectionist lines. That is to say the logic of events has reinforced the pressure of public opinion, and that is why we have acquiesced in the policy which this amendment seeks to get accepted to-day.

I come now to my amendment. I am free to admit that it differs little in form from Mr. Jammadas' Resolution. But I have thought it only right and only honest that I should explain clearly what is in the minds of the Government of India. Briefly our position is this. We agree in principle to protection. We make it clear that the principle must be applied cautiously and with discrimination, and we accept the unanimous recommendation of the Commission that before the principle is applied in concrete cases there must be a previous preliminary investigation by an authoritative impartial advisory board.

I will now take the clauses of the amendment in detail. Clause (a) needs no remark on my part. It accepts the principle of protection. Clause (b) makes it clear that in the application of this principle of protection regard must be had to the financial needs of the country and to our present dependence on import, export and excise duties for a large part of our revenue. Partly this clause is intended to make it clear that we must take our financial situation into account in considering certain specific recommendations of the Fiscal Commission in regard to export duties, certain classes of import duties, cotton excise and the like. The House will remember that the Fiscal Commission has recommended that two export duties, the export duties on hides and tea, should be taken off altogether; it has recommended that the cotton excise duty should go and it has recommended also that no import duty at all should be collected on machinery and on certain classes of imports, such as raw materials for Indian industries, copra and sulphur being cases in point. And it has recommended also that in certain classes of industries the most suitable form of assistance is bounties. These recommendations involve either a direct sacrifice of revenue or direct expenditure on the part of the Government of India, and I think that it will be clear to every one that, in considering recommendations of this kind, we must take careful note of the state of our finances. Partly again, the clause is intended to mark the need for caution in whatever advances we make. The House knows the importance of customs receipts in our Central revenues. Certain figures have been given in paragraph 25 of the Fiscal Commission's report; they are not quite correct, but I will give only the salient figures. In 1913-14 Customs revenues accounted for 13.7 of the total receipts of the Government of India; in the current year we have budgeted for a net Customs revenue of 45.11 crores of rupees, that is, 34 per cent. of our total revenues. Moreover, our basis of taxation is narrow, and I think that most people here will agree that we are perilously near the limit. It is true that retrenchment may enable us to reduce our expenditure at a price; on the other hand we have over 9 crores of provincial contributions which we are pledged to reduce and ultimately to abolish. I do not wish to make too much of this point. After all, one of the main advantages claimed for a policy of protection is that industrial development will add ultimately to the wealth, and, therefore, to the taxable capacity, of the people. My point is that the transition period must be difficult, and that we must always keep in view the danger of disorganising the public finances by too rapid and too violent action. Sir, it would have been easy for me to omit all reference to the financial situation. After all, we are concerned to-day solely with the principle of protection, and it would have been easy for me to omit all reference to the fact that the financial situation may operate as a brake on the application of that policy. But, Sir, the fact stares us in the face, and would it be honest for a responsible Government and for a responsible Legislature to shut its eyes to that fact?

I now come to the third clause, Sir, and, here again, I do not propose to say much. After what I have said, every one in the House will, I think, agree in the unanimous recommendation of the Commission that the principle of protection must be applied with discrimination, and, if we admit that discrimination must be exercised, I cannot think of any better criterion than a criterion based upon the well-known economic doctrine of comparative advantage. After all, what does it mean? It merely means this that we should concentrate our efforts on those directions where effort is most likely to prove fruitful of good to India.

In some ways the last clause of my amendment is the most important of all. The House will have noticed that I have made little mention of the difference between the majority and the minority reports. I have done so deliberately. I have not occupied myself with the question, as it was put to me, whether our protection should be protection with a big P or protection with a little p. The point to fasten on is that the Commission unanimously agreed in the recommendation that a policy of protection should be adopted and, whether we agree with the majority or whether we agree with the minority, it must be clear to all of us that the operative part of both reports is the Tariff Board. From the nature of the case both the reports deal mainly with generalities, and the one main, concrete, proposal made is that a Tariff Board should be appointed. Now, if I have carried the House with me so far, I think they will agree with me that, having accepted the principle of protection, the next step must be to decide what industries need and deserve protection and what kind or measure of protection they should get. There is, of course, a third question. There is the question whether we can afford to give the measure of protection recommended. That will ultimately need the decision of the Government and the Assembly, though even in the preliminary investigation it must be borne in mind. For the investigation of these first two questions, we agree with the Commission that what it calls a Tariff Board must be appointed. We feel that in questions of this kind a more detailed investigation is necessary than a Government Department can undertake, and, moreover, an investigation of a different kind. In many cases the interests of more than one industry will be affected; in many cases again there will be what the Fiscal Commission calls a conflict of interests. Each and every industry affected must be given a hearing, and that is why we think some kind of Board is necessary. It is quite clear, I think, that the duties of this Board must be purely of an investigating and advisory nature, as indeed the Fiscal Commission recommends. So far the matter seems clear enough, but there are many difficulties. The first question is whether the Board should be a permanent Board or a temporary Board. Now, I am quite prepared to admit that, if our policy is successful, we may require, if not a permanent Board, at any rate a Board for a long period of years. For industries tend to beget industries; but there are obvious dangers in a permanent Board. It may become an incubus rather than a help. Even in the United States of America the Tariff Commission at one time tended to become merely a sort of glorified Commercial Intelligence Department, very useful no doubt, but entirely beyond the resources of India at present. We think that the wisest course is to create a Board for one year in the first instance on an experimental basis. At the end of that year we can take stock of the position. We can see how the Board has worked; whether it needs alteration; we can decide whether to expand it or modify it, or whether to abolish it altogether and try some other expedient. That is to say, we follow the Australian precedent rather than the American precedent. Australia began by appointing its Board for two years in the first instance. We are in favour of this course for another reason. It assists in the solution of two other difficult questions, one the constitution of the Board and the other the exact relationship of the Board vis-à-vis the Government of India. I take the constitution first. I am aware that the minority report recommends that of the three Members of the Board two should be elected by the Indian Legislature, but I hope the House will agree with me that it is quite impossible for the Government to accept this suggestion. If we accept responsibility for a policy of protection, and, if we appoint a Tariff Board in order to help us in working out that policy, we must also accept responsibility for the constitution of the Board. What is the main essential of the Board which shall play such an important part in the working out of our policy? It is this. We must be able to rely on the Board for a perfectly impartial investigation of all relevant facts before it makes its recommendations. That is the first essential. The Board must be entirely impartial. No extraneous considerations of any kind must enter into its composition; and that is why I hope the House will not think that I am casting any reflection upon the Indian Legislature if I say that the Government feel that they must retain in their own hands the duty, or rather the responsibility, of appointing this Board. They cannot delegate that duty to anyone. They cannot trust to election even by the Indian Legislature.

Then again we have had some difficulty as regards the exact relationship of the Board to Government. If the House agrees that we should adhere to a policy of protection, then I am sure that it will also agree that we should take steps at once to make that policy effective and make it effective as rapidly as we can. That is to say—and I have particular reasons for this—I should like to set up the Tariff Board at once, and I should like to make such arrangements as will enable us to get quick decisions upon the recommendations of the Board. That is why, again following the Australian precedent, we have proposed that one member of the Board should be an official of Government. He is not intended to represent the interests of Government as if those interests were in any way divergent from the interests of the country. I hope I have made it clear to-day, in this speech of mine, that in this matter our interests and the interests of the country are, we hope, entirely identical. (Hear, hear.) The Board will be empowered to investigate the question which industries deserve protection, and what measure and kind of protection is needed. In framing its recommendations it will of course have to bear practical considerations in mind. It will have to try to frame such recommendations as can be accepted and as are practicable. Now that is why we think it advisable to have one of the members an officer of Government. He will act as a Liaison Officer between the Board and the Government. He will assist not only in keeping in touch with the officers of Government but he will assist in formulating recommendations. If we have a Board which is entirely independent of Government, what will be the result? We shall get its recommendations. There will be three departments of the Government of India which will be concerned—the Department of Commerce, the Department of Industries and the Department of Finance. The usual lengthy noting, which is a feature of the Government of India system, will go on. There may be disputes. The cases will then have to go to Council, and there will be inevitable delay. That is the reason for our proposal. We hope that in this way, by this device, we shall be able to get a quicker and an earlier decision upon the recommendations of the Board.

Sir, I am afraid that I have detained the House for a very long time; and even so I fear that I have been able to touch only the fringe of a very big and a very difficult subject. In our view the first essential in dealing with the recommendations of this very important Report is to get a decision on the question whether the policy of protection should be accepted, and if so, whether or not immediate steps should be taken to get that policy made effective. It is for these reasons that I have concentrated on these two main points. I quite admit that there are other important recommendations in the Fiscal Committee's Report and those recommendations will receive full consideration in due course. But it seemed to us to be useless to proceed to the consideration of those recommendations until we had got a decision on the main question of principle. Some people in this House may think that even on the main question of policy we have made only a grudging advance in the direction in which the House wants us to go. But I am sure on reflection the House will not endorse that opinion. We are dealing with a matter of vital importance. Our decision must have the most momentous consequences for the people of this country. In deference to what we know to be the strong feeling in this country, and for other reasons which I have explained, we are prepared to adopt a policy of protection. We accept the unanimous view of the Fiscal Commission that the principle must be applied with discrimination, and we are ready at once to set up the machinery which is necessary for the application of the principle. I hope the House will realise that we have done our best to identify ourselves with the aspirations which we know to be common in this country (Hear, hear.) But I am also confident that the House will recognise that a Government, placed as we are, are entitled, in dealing with this important question, to lay it down that the only safe and prudent course is to proceed with a proper measure of caution.

Sir, I commend my amendment to the House. (Hear, hear.)

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: Sir, there is only one difficulty with regard to (c). I thought the Honourable Mr. Innes read "with due regard to the well-being of the community and to the safeguards suggested," not "subject to the safeguards suggested" as printed on the paper.

Mr. President: Does the Honourable Member accept that?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: Yes, Sir, I am prepared to accept that in clause (c) of my amendment the words "subject" be omitted.

The proposed amendment was adopted.

Mr. J. P. Cotelingam (Nominated: Indian Christians): Sir, with your permission I would ask the Honourable Member if he would accept a slight amendment also in clause (d), namely, the omission of the word 'may'.

Mr. President: No, I cannot permit it. That is a substantial amendment which ought to be on the paper.

Mr. Campbell Rhodes (Bengal: European): Sir, as representing what may be called the other wing of the Fiscal Commission, I have very much pleasure in supporting the general conclusions at which my Honourable friend and colleague, Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas, has arrived in his Resolution. It is quite true we arrived by different paths. He chose the pleasant field path of national idealism which lies, I am afraid, sometimes very close to the quagmires of political and racial hatred. (Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas (and other Honourable Members): "No, no.") Whilst I travelled along the hard, dusty high road of plain economic truth, and therefore, Sir, I must be forgiven if perhaps I raise a little dust. I think one thing can be said of our Report, that it was an honest report; that we started with no preconceived ideas. We did not try to make out a case. Whenever we found a difficulty, whenever we found an argument against the conclusions at which we eventually arrived, we frankly put it down and therefore in our report I think are contained all the pros and cons of the question. I am in a little difficulty, Sir, as to whether I should support the proposal of my Honourable friend, or the amendment which has been put forward. At their annual meeting in January, the Associated Chambers of Commerce in Calcutta, over which I had the honour to preside, passed a Resolution, which has not yet been published, by an overwhelming majority. I think one Chamber only dissenting—very much on the lines of the amendment moved by the Hon. Mr. Innes, and therefore it is best perhaps that I should incline to the amendment. Well, Sir, what are the reasons which caused this wonderful unanimity in our general conclusions? We have been criticised both here and in other countries; but one criticism has never been directed against us, that we were a happy family playing at follow my leader. Mr. Jamnadas has referred to the cloud of witnesses. Well, some of those witnesses, Sir, were not helpful. National aspirations for self-determination and for self-development are admirable; but many of our witnesses seemed to think that because a thing was right for England it must therefore be wrong for India, and some of them seemed to think that in order to benefit India you must injure England. I do not think those arguments impressed us. A somewhat similar class of argument exists in England also. England has always laboured honestly under the impression that if a thing was right for England it must therefore be right for India; and in that, I think, lies a great fallacy. Mr. Innes has put his finger on the spot in this matter of unanimity. We did not find a clean slate. Had we done so, those who had preconceived notions of free trade might have tried to elaborate a free trade policy for India. We have not got that at the present time. We have a haphazard protection masquerading in the form of free trade. In all the criticisms by what I may call the whole-hog free trader since that report was published, I have seen no constructive criticism as to how we should have proceeded to produce a real free trade system for India as it exists, and I think rightly exists, for England. England depends for its revenue chiefly on direct taxation. Direct taxation in India can take two forms, one from the limited number of the wealthy from which sufficient revenue could not possibly be got; and the other by an increase in some of the existing direct taxation; for, obviously you cannot collect direct taxation of four annas or eight annas per head from the masses of the people. That means land taxes, and I think the Commission were convinced, whatever the rights or wrongs of increasing land taxation might be, that it was a physical impossibility to do so. In regard to import duties England is careful to keep her import duties confined to a few commodities which not only are not produced in England but cannot be. If we look through the import list of goods coming into India, I think we could claim that, theoretically at least, practically everything that comes in could be manufactured in this country and therefore a logical free trader would have to put excise duties not only on all local manufactures but threaten to put excise duties equivalent to our import duties on everything that came into the country so as to warn local manufacturers that they must not start industries under the protection of these revenue duties. We have thus not had the advantage of free trade to which I shall refer in one moment. We have not had the advantages of protection. As was pointed out by two very able witnesses, Mr. Shakespeare of Cawnpore and our Honourable friend, Captain Sassoon of Bombay, these high revenue duties were of no advantage as long as there was no security. They were sufficiently high to protect but there was no security and therefore the whole of the advantage that might be derived from these duties was lost. I consider these duties at present are high enough for the class of protection with which India should experiment. Mr. Jammadas advocates a self-contained India. I know it is a popular ideal. He says it would be a great standby in time of famine. Has Mr. Jammadas ever heard of that happy island in the Pacific where the people gain a precarious living by taking in each other's washing? What will happen in a famine year if we are self-contained? The food supplies will fall off; you have a big industrial population to feed, the industrial population depend for their custom on the merchants and by the process of taking in each other's washing Mr. Jammadas hopes the country will thrive. I must warn Mr. Jammadas colleagues from Bombay that if that is the vision before you your ovals will immediately stop working, for the demand for clothing will be satisfied not by Bombay but by Bengal. The country will then need to clothe itself only in sack cloth and ashes. I am not one of those who are so very pessimistic of the progress so far made. Industrial progress hitherto, in large factories at least, has been confined mainly to the temperate zones; we call them temperate but the real fact is that the rigours of the climate drive people to choose indoor occupations. Now, India stands alone, it is not only the foremost industrial country in the tropics, but is the only industrial country in the tropics. I admit the pace has not been fast enough, but I think it is wrong to overstate our case and say that there has been no progress whatsoever. I think that would be a reflection not only on the Scotsmen in Calcutta but on my Indian friends in Bombay and elsewhere. The Honourable Mr. Innes has drawn attention to the fact that this is an inopportune time to start a protectionist policy. I agree in a certain measure, but every business man knows that it is in times of dull trade that you put your house in order so as to be ready when good trade comes; and in that sense I think this is the most opportune time to make a start. Mr. Jammadas has mentioned the controversy between India and Lancashire or, as I would rather say, between Bombay and Lancashire, because the Punjab, Bihar and Bengal have never had any quarrel with Lancashire. (A Voice: "They are beginning to have.") I do hope that after this debate to-day one fact will emerge, that we agree to bury, and that our Resolution will bury this old animosity. (Hear, hear.) (A Voice: "Let Lancashire follow suit.") I have put my signature in this Report to that Chapter which recounts that regrettable history, let us be frank, of the interference of Lancashire with India's self-determination. But we must also remember that Lancashire has always been in the forefront of all political efforts of nations all over the world, including India, to develop self-Government and it is pathetic that, owing to the fact that she supported the Reform

[Sir Campbell Rhodes.]

Scheme in India, she is the first in a measure to suffer. At the same time, I am not prepared to believe that there is any real conflict between the two. Bengal requires double the amount of cloth than she uses now. She has a limited amount of money to spend on cloth, and as has been pointed out in the Dissenting Minute, in a quotation from a speech which I made in this House, 10 yards per annum per body is not sufficient. We therefore require all that Bombay and Lancashire can give us, and we also, I think, have a right of speaking for the people of Bengal, to buy what clothes suit us best. Therefore, when we get that Tariff Board at work, we shall find the conflict is not between Bombay and Lancashire, for I would draw Honourable Member's attention to that very illuminating sentence in our Report which says that "if we get rid of this conflict between Bombay and Lancashire, the Tariff Board will then be in a position to decide the real point at issue, and it will no longer be a matter between Bombay and Lancashire but between the Indian producer and the Indian consumer". There will, therefore, be conflict. There will be if we establish protection, a desire on the part of the manufacturer to consider his interests perhaps before those of the consumer. That has been so in all countries, and it will be no greater in this country; it may even be less. My Honourable friend, Mr. Townsend, will remember when he and I some years ago went down to Bombay to arrange standard cloth for the poor of Punjab, Bihar and Bengal, that we met with a most sympathetic response from the Bombay Millowners, and I am still grateful for what happened in the budget debate last year when they supported my amendment for the reduction of the import duty. I do not know what secrets are locked up in the breast of the Honourable the Finance Member, but I can let out one secret that, if he proposes to put up the duty this year, there will be at least one vote in the lobby against him. It is this possible conflict of interest between province and province, between industry and agriculture, between industry and industry, which has caused us to recommend in the best interests of India that the adoption of a policy of protection should be applied with discrimination along the lines of our Report. We do not recommend a rash and reckless plan of protection, for we believe that that way leads to disaster. We do not recommend the present haphazard system of protection masquerading under the guise of free trade. We do not recommend that our policy should be settled for us by any one outside this country. (Hear, hear.) We recommend protection not only of the interests of our industries but of the interests of the agriculturist. We recommend protection, by the exercise of wise discrimination, of the consumer. If I may misquote in conclusion a famous democrat, I would say that we have recommended protection of the interests of the people in this land, by the people in this land, and for the people in this land.

Mr. O. A. H. Townsend (Punjab: Nominated Official): I regret, Sir, to have to turn this debate to a provincial aspect, despite what the Honourable Mr. Innes said, but I come from the Punjab and the views which I am about to put forward represent, I think, not only the views of a great number of people in that province but perhaps also those of other agriculturists in other parts of India. Now, Sir, the Punjab is and must continue for very many years, so far as I can see, even under protection, to be an agricultural and not an industrial province, and to put it briefly, many of us think that under a policy of even discriminating protection, however much you may discriminate it, we will certainly suffer, at any rate, for very many years to come. The great majority of our Punjab people are agriculturists, pure and simple. We have but few minerals, no cheap waterways to help our transport, and practically no coal: practically all the coal we use has to be brought many hundreds of miles by rail from the Bengal coal-fields, and costs at least Rs. 5 per ton more in Lahore than in Cawnpore owing to the longer railway journey.

The Punjab generally exports raw materials and imports manufactured articles. On the average of the last five years I find that no less than 84 per cent. of Punjab exports—not all to foreign countries—consisted of raw materials, and 66 per cent. of our imports was manufactured articles. Of the balance much was food for our cattle. And, Sir, despite what the Honourable Mover said on the subject, labour in the province, both skilled and unskilled, is both scarce and dear, and costs more than in the neighbouring United Provinces, thereby placing us at an additional disadvantage compared with it from the industrial point of view. Nor will our difficulties in this matter get less, when the large tracts of the country which will be irrigated by the Sutlej Canals, now under construction, come under cultivation. Whatever degree of protection, Sir, may be introduced, I can never visualise the sandy tracts of Mianwali or Multan or the arid country lying to the south of the Sutlej as industrialised. Again, Sir, as Mr. Calvert, the Registrar of Co-operative Societies in the Punjab, points out in his book "The Wealth and Welfare of the Punjab," to which I am indebted for much of what I say this morning,—we are handicapped in this matter by our geographical position. Assume industries to become successfully established in the province, where are we to find a market for our manufactures? The Punjab is bounded on three sides by countries which offer no market for its products. Kashmir, Ladakh and Tibet lie on the north, on the west Afghanistan and Baluchistan, on the south Rajputana, sparsely populated and undeveloped. None of these regions have sufficient population to make them satisfactory markets for our manufactured goods. It is often said that an ounce of fact is worth a ton of theory. Well, here is an ounce of fact. During the war, one of the few Cotton Weaving and Spinning Mills in the Punjab came into the market. It was purchased lock, stock and barrel, by a firm in Bombay. Instead of using the factory, as it was, in the Punjab, the purchasers found it to their advantage to remove all the machinery of the mill at very considerable expense to Bombay, where it was, I understand, used in a new mill, and the shell of the building is still standing, a sad monument to Punjab industries, decaying and unused. Briefly, Sir, many people in the Punjab fear that a policy of protection for India will only impoverish the agriculturists who form the great majority of our people at the expense of those parts of India which are already manufacturing centres as Bombay and Calcutta. During the war, Sir, the industries situated at those places had in effect, as Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas said, protection. I hold in my hand a well-known commercial paper and, glancing down the dividends paid by the Bombay Cotton Mills for the years 1918—1921, I see the figures of 50, 60 and even 100 per cent. Now, in the Punjab, Sir, during those years, cotton cloth and yarn, much of which came from Bombay, went up nearly 100 per cent. in price. Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas did not mention, I notice, this point when he discussed the effect of the war on Indian industries.

In this connection, I might criticise incidentally the personnel of the Fiscal Commission. I do not know if I am in order in doing so. It was composed of eminent men, but the eminence of, at any rate, the great majority of them was that of either successful business men or professors of economics. No one of them, I think, had attained any great eminence as a "consumer," though I readily admit it is not easy to find a "consumer" such as I would like to find in this connection. Punjab agriculture, and agriculture generally in India, asks for free trade, whatever industries ask for. The great majority of our people wish to import what they require free of duty and also they ask that no restrictions should be placed on the export of their products, which are, as I have said, generally raw materials, though of course we would not object to a very small cess designed to help our agriculture as the proposed cotton cess. It is true, Sir, that the Commission decisively pronounced itself against any policy of export duties on food grains. For this relief much thanks. But experience in all protected countries of the world shows that a policy of high protection on imported goods eventually has the effect of reducing the prices that other countries are willing to pay for the exports of protected countries, and it is possible that in the long run our Punjab exports of raw materials may suffer in this way.

Before I conclude, Sir, I wish to say a few words on the question of protection for India as a whole. The example of America as a country which has successfully adopted protection is often quoted in India. Well, Sir, let us see what Professor Taussig, an American Professor of Economics, whom the Commission itself calls distinguished, has to say on the subject. After discussing in detail the pros and cons of the relative advantages and disadvantages of protection to the United States, he comes to the considered conclusion—I quote his own words—"that there probably remains a heavy debit balance against protection."

Mr. Jajnadhas has quoted, approvingly, the example of Japan in this matter and has urged India to follow the example of that country. Well, Sir, let me give him an extract from Mr. Calvert's book to show how Japanese industries have been faring recently:

"The expansion of industries in Japan in recent years was abnormal and unhealthy. In 1919, for example, there were erected 2,700 factories, involving a capital of 522 million yen, but depression set in and a great slump in business followed, and many failures ensued. The unbridled speculation and wild company promotion led inevitably to severe reaction. In the single month of June 1920 no less than 134 Joint Stock Companies went into liquidation."

There is, Sir, all through India a wide belief that the mere introduction of protection in India will, ipso facto, cause industries to spring up on a large scale all over the country; that there is in the mere word a charm, as in Abracadabra. Believe me, Sir, never was a greater mistake made, so far at any rate as the agricultural provinces of India are concerned. Of the three tests laid down by the Tariff Commission which industries claiming protection must face, the third test is infinitely the most important. It is that the industry to be protected must be one which will eventually be able to face world competition without protection. The last few words are all important. The intention is that the protection given should in no case last for ever. Professor Taussig calls this test the decisive test. Well, Sir, experience all over the world shows how difficult it is, once protected duties are imposed, to take them off; each protected industry, when a proposal is made to remove protection from it, sets up a howl. Professor Taussig says:

"We are told in the same breath that prices have been brought down and a flourishing industry brought to maturity, but at the same time, that the duties must not be touched."

Particularly from this point of view, but indeed generally, I do not envy the proposed Tariff Board in the discharge of its duties. What is said on the subject by another distinguished American Economist is in point. He says:

"Protection involves political corruption on a gigantic scale. One has but to witness the scenes in and about the Committee room when a tariff is being framed in the United States to realise that there exists no more potent engine of political demoralisation: section is pitted against section, interest against interest, and business against business; and the final decisions arrived at are only the results of log-rolling and a series of unholy alliances."

I direct these remarks to the attention of the House. I am only too well aware, Sir, that vocal Indian public opinion and sentiment is very strongly in favour of protection, and sentiment will largely influence the decision which will be come to in this matter by the House to-day. I would ask it, however, not to let sentiment in this matter be entirely separated from economic considerations, and also to remember that the decision they will arrive at, as was well said by Mr. Jammadas Dwarkadas, as to the future fiscal policy of India is a matter of the very greatest importance to the welfare of the people of every part of India and that that decision may have effects in future years which are not now anticipated or even considered. Still, Sir, we must realise that the Punjab cannot cut itself off from the rest of India, much though we might like to do so, not only on this matter but also perhaps on another matter that is coming under discussion in this House next week. Nor, of course, can the financial difficulties of the Government of India, which are brought out in Mr. Innes's amendment, be overlooked. So, Sir, I am unwillingly forced to support this amendment, lest a worse thing befall us.

Mr. N. M. Joshi (Nominated: Labour Interests): Sir, as I propose to maintain a critical attitude towards both the original Resolution as well as the amendment proposed by the Honourable Mr. Innes, I think it is my duty at the outset to make my position clear on one fundamental principle. Sir, I am not against the development of industry. I fully appreciate the difficulty of the country dependent for its livelihood upon mere agriculture. I am fully alive also to the dangers of famine, but, Sir, Mr. Jammadas Dwarkadas has not proved how famine would be averted by industrial development. But, although famines cannot be averted, I admit this much, that it is necessary to give varied occupations to the people of this country in order that the pressure on the land should be relieved at least to some extent. Sir, I also want to make my position on another question clear. As long as the nations of the world have not ceased fighting with each other, I admit it is necessary that every nation should try, as far as possible, to be self-contained. There are disadvantages of this attempt, and those are pointed out by my Honourable friend Sir Campbell Clarke.

But, Sir, I admit that it is necessary, as long as the world has not ceased fighting with each other, that every country should make an attempt to be as self-contained as possible. Having accepted these two fundamental principles I want to discuss whether a high tariff is the only method of protecting the industries in this country. Personally I divide the methods of protecting industries into three categories. The first is a high tariff, which is a very popular method. Secondly, the method proposed by the Industries Commission, namely, assisting the industries by various means such as research, industrial training, giving concessions in the form of land, etc., or even giving bounties to the industries or guaranteeing interest as we do in the case of Railways. There is a third method of protecting and developing industry and that is by the State undertaking to manage the industry. (Some Honourable Members: "No, no.") Some people say "No, no." I am not much concerned with them. Let me first refer to the advantages and disadvantages of the first method of protecting the industry, namely, a high tariff wall. The reason why this method is preferred is, in the first place, that the burden which is thrown on the people is indirect. The poor people, especially the illiterate people, cannot see that they are contributing towards the building up of the industry. The Industrial Commission knew very well that if they had proposed that the industries in this country should be developed not by indirect taxation but by direct taxation, the Legislative Assembly would not have accepted that principle. The industrialists want that the people on whom the burden falls should not know that they are bearing the burden.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas : Has the Commission claimed that?

Mr. N. M. Joshi : Sir, I am asked whether the Commission has claimed that or not. I am explaining what people, when they advocate protection, have in their minds, and I feel that this is in their minds whenever they advocate high import duties instead of advocating direct contribution to the industry. Sir, there is a second advantage to the industrialist in having protection by means of a high tariff wall, and that is that he is free of all Government intervention. If an industry wants protection or is given protection by direct method, Government will insist upon intervening in its affairs. Take the case of Railways. Government guaranteed interest to the Railway Companies, but then when Government guaranteed interest, they kept to themselves the right of intervening in the affairs of the Companies. Therefore the industrialists do not generally like that the assistance to be given to them should be direct. They generally prefer assistance which takes an indirect form, which leaves them free to do what they like. The third argument that may be urged in favour of a tariff wall instead of direct assistance to the industry is that the collection charges of indirect taxes are not so large as the collection charges of direct taxes. Sir, this is a matter of proof. My Honourable friend, Mr. Innes, will tell the House how we stand in the matter. But even admitting that the collection charges of direct taxes are a little higher, is it right that we should throw away all the advantages of direct taxation and accept a method of assisting industries which contains several dangers which have been admitted by every speaker who has spoken up to this time? We have seen the advantages. They are not many. But there are great disadvantages in the method of protecting industries by means of a high tariff wall. Let us suppose for the sake of argument that a high tariff wall is necessary. A large amount of money will be thrown into the pockets of the industrialists by a high tariff wall. But what is the guarantee that the money thrown into the pockets of the industrialists by that means will be spent for the development of the industries? Sir, it will not be very uncharitable if I say that at least some part of that money will be spent on the luxuries of the industrialists themselves. Will they not spend part of the money for their motor cars, for hiring half a dozen palaces and for purchasing race horses? Sir, the money for all their luxuries will come out of the money which will be placed in their hands by means of protection. Therefore, let the House be sure that when you put money into the pockets of the industrialists with the intention that the industries should be developed, at least all that money will not be spent for the development of the industries, but a great part of it will be spent for the luxuries of the industrialists. There is another disadvantage in giving protection to the industry by means of a high tariff wall, and it is this. If you give help to an industry by means of a high tariff wall, you cannot discriminate between a good industrialist and a bad industrialist. A good industrialist may spend all the money that he gets in developing the industry but a bad industrialist will not so spend that money. This is a great disadvantage. But we can discriminate between a deserving industrialist and an undeserving one by giving direct help to the industries. But, Sir, the main disadvantage of a high tariff wall, which has been mentioned both by the Honourable Mr. Innes and the Honourable Mr. Rhodes is high prices. Sir, the high prices have to be borne by the poor people in larger proportion to their income than the richer classes. Nobody will say here that if you have got a tariff wall on articles such as cloth, the poor man will not suffer more in proportion to his income than the rich man. The poor man pays on cloth more in proportion to his income than the rich man pays. This fact is absolutely clear. Therefore, a high tariff wall on necessities of life can never be just. It falls unjustly on the poor man. I am not saying that the poor man should not pay at all. But nobody will also say that the poor man should pay more in proportion to his capacity to pay than the rich man. This is the greatest disadvantage of the method of protecting an industry by means of a high tariff wall. Sir, I know there are people—I do not know whether they are here or not, but I have met them several times—who say “where is the harm? Is it not the duty of the people of this country to support the industry? Is it not our duty to support Bombay as against Lancashire?” Sir, I can appreciate the sentiment of patriotism, and I also know that the poor people of this country have got some patriotism. But should your patriotism be only confined to the poorer class? If industry is to be developed at the cost of the poor people, can it not be developed at the cost of the wealthy? Sir, I have read through the report (of the Fiscal Commission). I have read through the majority's recommendations as well as every line of the recommendations of the minority—the patriotic minority. But I have not found one sentence there appealing to the wealthier class to spend their wealth not in luxury but in developing industries. Sir, I have not seen one appeal to the richer class there asking them to develop the industries, even if it were necessary for them to suffer loss for the developing of industries. On the contrary, it has been said that our capital is shy, capital requires encouragement. It is, therefore, clear that the Indian capitalist is not sufficiently patriotic. If the Indian capitalist is patriotic he will not be shy to invest his capital in a national industry, the capital will come forth even if there are losses. Therefore, when people talk of patriotism, what they mean is that that patriotism should be shown by the poorer classes and not by the richer classes. The richer classes require temptation, encouragement in order that they should put their money into industries. But, Sir, some people say “Do you not want industries?” Suppose we cannot develop industries without putting even an unjustifiable burden upon the poorer people. Sir, I do not wish to answer that question. I only say that these are not the only two alternatives. If these are the only two alternatives, namely, either not to develop industries at all, or to develop industries by putting a burden, an unjustifiable burden upon the poorer classes, then I do not know what would be my answer. I shall think then. But I believe there is a third alternative. You can protect your industries without putting an unjustifiable burden, at least without putting a disproportionately high burden upon the poorer classes, and that method is to assist the industries by means of direct assistance. Give any kind of direct assistance, I shall not object. If there is direct assistance, naturally in the first place, that assistance could be given only to those industries that are deserving. It will be given only to those industrialists who deserve, who do not spend their money in luxuries and whose industries do not suffer losses on account of mismanagement. Sir, it may be said, "If you give direct assistance to the industries, how are the taxes to be collected, how is the money to come?" That money will be collected by indirect taxation." Sir, it is true that the amount of direct contribution may have been obtained by indirect taxation. I do not approve of indirect taxation, but even if the taxation is indirect if you give direct help there is the pressure of public opinion. The public will know what person is being helped with the public money, and the public will exact that that industrialist is careful in managing the industry. That is the great advantage. The whole industry will be under the criticism of the public of this country who pay towards that industry.

Then, Sir, as regards the State management of industry, this is one of the methods which has been recommended not by me alone but by the Industrial Commission itself. The Industrial Commission has said that under certain circumstances it is necessary for Government to pioneer a new industry.

Mr. President: Order, order. That is not strictly in order under this Resolution.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: I do not wish to speak on this subject alone. As a matter of fact, it is not necessary for me to dilate on the advantages of State management.

Mr. President: Not necessary! It is not possible

Mr. N. M. Joshi: I only content myself by saying that a high tariff wall is not the only method of protecting an industry. An industry can be protected by the State managing the industry. This has been done not only in this country but outside, and as a matter of fact the advantages of that method will be explained to this House not by a theoretical man like myself, but by experienced industrialists like my Honourable friends Mr. Jammadas Dwarkadas and Mr. Kamat, when the question of the management of State railways comes before this House. Therefore, I do not propose to speak about the advantages of that method.

But, Sir, there is one more point on which I should like to speak and it is this. My Honourable friend, Mr. Jammadas Dwarkadas, said that there are dangers in protection. He admitted that. Unfortunately he did not mention them, but I propose to mention them only in a few words. Those people who want to know the dangers of industrialism should visit the Slums of Bombay. That beautiful island given by Nature to this country has been turned into a hell by the industrialists. (A Voice: "Are you against industrialism?") Is it not necessary if we want to develop our industries to take precautions that more such hells are not created in this country? Then again take the question of people who leave their villages and go into cities. People in villages have got the joint family system. If any one of them is ill, he is looked after by his relatives, by his neighbours. If he is old, his son, his grandson

Mr. President: That does not arise on this Resolution.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: I am only pointing out the dangers of protection.

Mr. President: That danger may happen even where there is no protection. It is not relevant to the subject under consideration.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: It is true that these dangers may take place where there is no protection, but here we are advocating protection in order that industries should develop very fast and there is the greater danger of these evils arising when you are developing industries very fast. As a matter of fact, all the slums in Bombay are due to the fact that the industries developed very fast without giving sufficient time for people to build houses.

Mr. President: The Honourable Member must address his remarks to the policy of protection. I may point out to him that the clock tells me that he has already spoken for more than fifteen minutes.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: I do not wish to take up the time of the House, but I wish to refer to only one other evil of protection, and it is a direct evil of protection. When a country undertakes a policy of protection, it means high prices. High prices mean discontent and when poor working classes become discontented the only method possible for them of getting redress is to organise themselves and getting their grievances redressed by means of strikes. But at this stage what happens? The industrialist who wants to develop his industries very quickly by means of protection wants to restrain those organisations as much as possible. That has been the experience of the world.

Mr. President: I cannot allow the Honourable Member to discuss trade union legislation on a motion asking for the establishment of protection.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: I have felt that, if a policy of protection is followed there will necessarily be discontent among the working classes, and if there will be discontent among the working classes they will have to organise themselves, and in order that the organisation should grow strong it is necessary that freedom of organisation and freedom of strike should be allowed

Mr. President: If I had not been in the Chair I would have been very glad to discuss this matter with the Honourable Member. But I have to tell him that his argument is entirely out of order.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: I shall content myself now by making an appeal to the Honourable Members of the Assembly. My Honourable friend, Mr. Innes, has already referred to the fact that the masses on whom the burden of protection will fall are not represented here. After all, whom does this Legislative Assembly represent? It represents the electors whose number is a very small fraction of the population. It may be one per cent. I assure the House that it is after all a very small percentage of the population. I do not mention this point to belittle the importance and dignity of this House. As a matter of fact, I admit that for practical purposes we could not have got a more representative Legislative Assembly than this. But, Sir, that should not blind us to the fact that the masses of the people are not represented here and when we are considering the question of putting a burden on the masses more in proportion to their income than the burden falling upon the richer classes, it is our duty to put greater restraint upon ourselves, to be more cautious in pressing burdens upon the poor people than it was necessary for us if the burden had to fall more upon us and more upon our electors. With these words I move the amendment which stands in my name to the amendment moved by the Honourable Mr. Innes.

Mr. President: The Honourable Member will realise that during the conversation which I had with him I informed him that the last half of his amendment is out of order, seeing that it attempts to bring in the question of trade union legislation before adopting a policy of protection. That is not within the scope of the Resolution.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: If the second part is out of order, I propose the first part:

"Provided that measures adopted with that end in view be so framed that the financial burden resulting therefrom will fall upon the people in proportion to their capacity to bear it."

I hope the House will accept my amendment.

Mr. President: If I had known that the Honourable Member was moving his amendment, I should probably have called somebody else, because I think it is desirable to have the proposition put by the Government debated against the proposition put forward by Mr. Jannadas Dwarkadas. At the same time, the first part of the Honourable Member's amendment is in order.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: I shall move my amendment later on.

Dr. H. S. Gour (Nagpur Division: Non-Muhammadan): Does the Honourable Member move his amendment as an additional amendment to the original Resolution or as an amendment to Mr. Innes' amendment.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: As a matter of fact it can be made an amendment to anyone of the two.

Mr. President: I must inform the Honourable Member that his amendment was originally put down as an amendment to Mr. Jannadas Dwarkadas' Resolution. He did not know then that Mr. Innes' Resolution is going to contain the words "with due regard to the well being of the community." I should imagine that these words would have satisfied the point raised by the Honourable Member, though, as I have told him, he is perfectly in order in moving it.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: I do not know what will suit the House. If it suits the House that my amendment should be an amendment to the original Resolution, I do not object. If it suits the House, I have no objection to its being treated as an amendment to the Honourable Mr. Innes' amendment.

Dr. H. S. Gour: On a point of order. It is for the Honourable Mover of the amendment to say as to whether it is an amendment to the original motion or any particular amendment. It is not left to the decision of the House to accept that amendment as either an amendment to the motion or an amendment to an amendment.

Mr. President: I think it will simplify the position if I treat this as an amendment to Mr. Innes' amendment.

The question is:

"That at the end of the amendment as proposed by Mr. Innes, add the following:

'Provided that measures adopted with that end in view be so framed that the financial burden resulting therefrom will fall upon the people in proportion to their capacity to bear it.'

The motion was negatived.

Mr. B. S. Kamat (Bombay Central Division: Non-Muhammadan Rural): I believe what is germane and also important to the discussion of this morning is a criticism of the amendment standing in the name of my friend, the Honourable Mr. Innes, and not a general discussion ranging over a wide field over the advantages and disadvantages of free trade or protection, a discussion like the one indulged in by my friend, Mr. Joshi, or even by Mr. Townsend, from the Punjab; because it is only half an hour ago that the Government announced and committed themselves to the principle that they are prepared to accept protection. All that concerns us therefore this morning is to discuss whether the amendment standing in the name of Mr. Innes requires any criticism at all. I shall direct my remarks only to this aspect of the question. In the first place let me congratulate the Government on coming to a satisfactory decision on such a momentous issue. The question was hanging fire for decades, for almost half a century and I believe the Government have done well in coming to a favourable decision, however tardily it might be, on so important a point; further, it is indeed a matter of gratification, Sir, for the country that Government are prepared to accept protection with discrimination as unanimously recommended by the Fiscal Commission. Having said that and offered my congratulations to Government on this decision, it remains for me to meet certain criticisms and remarks made by Mr. Innes in his opening speech. Mr. Innes pointed out that although Government are accepting this policy of protection they are accepting it with a great deal of anxiety and a great deal of caution. I realise the anxiety of the Government at the present moment. I also realise that a certain amount of caution in the application of this policy is necessary but I venture to think, Sir, that Government are in one or two respects at any rate labouring under an excess of caution as I shall presently show. I agree that there is a certain amount of anxiety involved in undertaking this policy at the present moment when we are passing through financial depression and deficits in the Budget. On the other hand, Sir, it is precisely at this particular period of transition in India when existing industries are threatened that this question has to be boldly tackled by Government, especially owing to the world facts to which Mr. Innes has referred; it is precisely at this moment that protection is necessary, either to keep alive certain industries which are struggling in the country or to withstand the low prices which foreign manufacturers are announcing in order to keep their own industries alive. Therefore if there was any time which was urgent for protection, it was, I believe, this time. Government, I say, need not, therefore, be very much uneasy that the time is inauspicious. Now with reference to certain observations of Mr. Innes regarding factors within India relating to the internal situation which compelled caution, he mentioned two or three things. He referred to the effect of this policy on the agricultural classes. He referred also to what the effect of this policy would be on the middle classes. He also referred to the effect of this policy on the finances of the Government, that is to say, the sources of revenue. With reference to the effect of this policy on the agricultural conditions in India, those who have studied economics, those also who have read the Report of the Fiscal Commission will be able to see that after all it is a question of balance of advantages. It is perfectly true that the rise of prices has a certain adverse effect on the agricultural community but, on the other hand, take a long view of the whole thing and just see the effect of this policy of protection, say at the end of 15 or 30 years. Take the example of other countries like Germany and America which were at one time agricultural countries. The policy of protection has made those countries now more or less manufacturing countries with the result that the wealth of those countries is immensely better than what it would have been if they had remained agricultural countries. The question is, do you want wealth for agriculturists or not? Now we know there are 72 per cent. of agriculturists in the country out of the total population, but out of those 72 the real workers in the field are, let me point out, 46 per cent. only. The rest are workers of a casual character either in industries or even in agricultural labour. The point therefore is, if owing to a system of industrialism the wages go up, will it not profit those workers who come to factories or those workers who are also in agricultural industries. There, therefore, remains only a residue of 46 per cent. of the population who are directly concerned with the sowing and ploughing of their own fields who will be no doubt for some time adversely hit. The other agricultural workers who are more or less labourers will profit to some degree by the automatic rise in the prices and also in wages. Then again, even if there is a little bit of temporary evil in this policy of protection for the agriculturist, I think Government has provided safeguards to minimise the burden. We know that the Tariff Board will see that the burden will not be too heavy for the agriculturist. The machinery provided to fix the rate of protection is a very sound safeguard; I therefore think judging by the analogy of the other countries and considering the proportion of burden that will fall upon the agriculturist population and also the safeguards, namely, the creation of an impartial and thoroughly investigating body, namely, the Tariff Board, we can, in spite of some disadvantages which I have dilated upon, go ahead and accept protection. I need not refer to what fell from Mr. Joshi about the capitalist and his luxuries. I believe that luxuries do give a benefit to the capitalist no doubt, but the benefit is not confined to the capitalist. If a capitalist buys a motor car, he has to employ a chauffeur and a portion of the money of the capitalist goes into the pocket of the chauffeur, also into the pocket of the man who sells petrol and also into the pocket of the cleaner. And, perhaps, if there is a manufacturing industry of motor cars in India some day or other in accordance with this policy of protection, possibly that factory will be able to employ hundreds of labourers into whose pockets also the money of the capitalist will go. We need not therefore fear that a manufacturing country will benefit only the capitalist. England was at one time an agriculturist country. At the present moment 56 per cent. of the population of England is a manufacturing population and every man who goes into some factory draws more wages and leads a better life, has a higher standard of living, has far better clothes to wear and far better houses to live in than perhaps the agriculturist in India who, merely because he remains an agriculturist, lives in a wretched hut and draws only the bare means of subsistence. I know that the agriculturist could be a richer man and live a better life if he goes into a manufacturing factory. That is, so far as the aspect of the agriculturists' disadvantages is concerned. Now about the amendment, there is one aspect of what fell from the Honourable Mr. Innes to-day to which I wish to address my remarks, that is, with reference to this Tariff Board. If you read clauses (a), (b), (c) and (d) of the Honourable Mr. Innes' amendment, in clauses (a) and (b) probably we shall find nothing very seriously objectionable. He has admitted the word "protection" in clause (b). He has put in a safeguard that regard must be had to the financial needs of the country. We admit that that must be our policy as well and a Tariff Board which will fix the rate of protection will see to it that the financial needs and the financial exigencies of Government are not sacrificed to the hobby of protection. But, Sir, let us discuss the safeguards introduced in paragraph 97 of the Fiscal Commission's Report on which the whole of the amendment of the Honourable Mr. Innes is based. I had hoped that Mr. Jammadas Dwarkadas, while making his speech, would refer to the points of difference between the majority and minority on this specific question. The position is this: Government accept protection; Government accept discrimination, but Government say they are willing to accept discrimination as laid down and subject to the three conditions in paragraph 97. The only question which is very important is, do we, on the non-official side, subscribe to these three conditions which Government are prepared to accept? That is the question at issue. Now, the first condition is that the industry to be protected must have certain natural advantages. I admit this is a condition which is not very seriously objectionable. The second condition is that the industry must be one which without the help of some protection is not likely to develop or will develop only at a very slow speed. That, again, probably may be a condition which is unobjectionable from a certain point of view. But, Sir, look at the third condition to which Mr. Townsend referred, namely, that the industry must be able eventually to face world competition. If that is the condition to which Mr. Innes refers in accepting the policy of protection with discrimination I have my own misgivings. In a country, situated as India is at the present moment, with immense handicaps owing to poverty, untrained men and inexperienced capital, with world competition from all the different countries to face with I am afraid, if you rigidly follow this condition and this safeguard, as the majority of the Fiscal Commission recommend, it will be difficult for any Tariff Board to give protection, subject to this condition, if rigidly followed. My criticisms, therefore, against Mr. Innes' amendment is that, even supposing they accept discrimination and refer the question to the Tariff Board, the instructions to the Tariff Board should not be to stand upon each and every letter of the third test laid down in paragraph 97. I contend that if, really speaking, the Tariff Board is to do good to India, and at an early date, a certain amount of latitude must be given to that Tariff Board. That is so far as clause (c) of Mr. Innes' amendment is concerned.

Now, I come, Sir, to clause (d), viz., the constitution and the period of time allotted to this Board. Mr. Innes wants that the life of this Tariff Board, which Government are prepared to accept, should be only one year, and he bases that on the analogy of Australia, where even it was two years, in the first instance, I think, Sir, that a period of one year only for any corporate body is too small a period for a trial. It is an experiment, as I have said, made with an excess of caution and is not likely to benefit India. If you accept protection, if there is no escape from protection, there is no escape from a permanent Tariff Board. I do not like that Government should show this suspicion and a certain amount of hesitation in stating to this House that we should subscribe to the view that the Tariff Board should be appointed only for twelve months. I submit that it will take twelve months for the Tariff Board simply to think out its ideas to fix their preliminaries and to know where they are before they investigate a single industry. I therefore think that this should be a permanent Tariff Board, or at least one constituted for a longer period, say five years.

And now I come to the composition of this Tariff Board. Government want that the Chairman of this Tariff Board should be a Government official on the analogy of Australia where the Controller of Customs is the Chairman of the Tariff Board. I do not object to that, namely, that one member out of the three should be a Government official. The other two are to be members not necessarily chosen by the Legislature according to the amendment of Mr. Innes. The minority report of the Fiscal Commission suggested that the two members, if there are to be three in all, should be elected by the Legislature. Now, between these two methods of appointment we have to compare where the greater advantage lies. After giving my close consideration to this matter, I am inclined to think that the amendment of Mr. Innes is reasonable and right. It would be difficult I believe at the present time for the two Houses of the Indian Legislature to elect persons of the right type we want to serve on the Tariff Board. In the first place, the conflict of interests either between capitalist and agriculturist, or between industry and industry, or between Bengal and Bombay, would be so great, that it would be far better that the Tariff Board should be above any sort of suspicion by the public at large. Even, speaking from the point of view of the Members of this House, I think it would be far better for the Members of this House to be away from the Tariff Board and, therefore, to be away from the criticisms and the suspicion that they have succumbed to any kind of political corruption, as my friend, Mr. Townsend, put it. Sir, at the present stage of India, we want to be above any reproach that what we do in that Tariff Board is one way or other against the agriculturist or in the interests of the capitalist. From this point of view, I certainly think that it would be far better that the two other members of the Tariff Board should be outsiders chosen by Government but confirmed on the Tariff Board with the approval and with the consent of this House, that is to say, that the two other members of the Board selected or suggested by Government should have their names placed for approval or consent before this House, so that we should also have a means of knowing that the selection of Government was right and proper. Our approval also should be given to the appointment either of the co-opted members, or the two permanent members forming the Tariff Board. This would be in the spirit of the recommendations of the minority who have cited the example of the Senate of the American Tariff Board. These are the few criticisms which I had to make. I do not think I shall enter into the merits of the long speech of my friend. Mr. Joshi, although he went for capitalists and made certain remarks which were not quite relevant to the question at issue. We can discuss those questions on some other occasion. What is now necessary is to discuss, as I said, the Honourable Mr. Innes' amendment and I have ventured to offer these suggestions and these criticisms in the hope that when the Tariff Board comes to be appointed Government will see that the Board will enjoy the confidence of this Legislature and of the country at large and will be a properly constituted body.

Sardar Bahadur Gajjan Singh (Punjab: Nominated Non-Official): Sir, I rise to address this Honourable House in the interests of agriculture. There is not a single Member of this House who, I venture to think, is not anxious to see the development of the industries of the soil, but at the same time it should be borne in mind that in making provision for the development of our future industries we are not damaging our existing industries. As is well known, agriculture is the industry of the largest number of people in India. As has been pointed out by the Honourable Mr. Innes, more than 66 per cent. live upon it; they make their living out of it. Now it is admitted on behalf of Government as well as on behalf of my friend on the right that the imposition of protection is likely—in fact, not only likely but certain—to be more harmful in so far as agriculturists, or those who are busy in agriculture, will have to pay high prices for the things which they require for their industry. Now, Sir, as we all know, agriculturists are very very poor. My province is mainly a province of small holdings. This, I think, is also true to some extent or perhaps to a greater extent of the United Provinces, Bihar and Orissa, and in fact all other Provinces with the exception perhaps of Bengal, and the United Provinces in so far as they have very big taluqdars. At present their position is very deplorable. They cannot make both ends meet and their produce as we all know is from time to time subjected to various unnatural restrictions in the way of restrictions on the export of wheat and so on. So if that will be the result on agriculture of protection, then I am afraid I must warn the Government against the introduction of this policy. At any rate, they have to be more cautious. There should be more discrimination—of course, we are assured there will be,—so that the interests of agriculturists and of the middle-classes may not suffer. As has been pointed out by my Honourable friend, Mr. Joshi, some other means may be adopted for the development of industries in India other than protection, and if that cannot be done I am afraid we must go without it, because it is not advisable—it will, in fact, be unwise for us to injure the present agricultural industry which, of course, is the life and soul of India. Other industries will manufacture things which perhaps may be necessary or may not be necessary and in certain cases probably will be luxuries, but agriculture gives us our food; the agriculturists are the food givers of India. If by protection, which, of course, obviously means that the local markets of India are meant for local manufacturers, we are at the mercy of these industrialists and we have to pay high prices, then agriculture in this country is sure to suffer. On account of high prices cultivation might go low; perhaps it may not be worth while to cultivate land and produce the necessary food for the consumption of the consumer. I am afraid therefore I cannot give my support to the Resolution of my Honourable friend, Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas. I think those who have studied the question may perhaps be able to throw more light on it, but my apprehension is that if there is a protective tariff against the import of articles from other countries, as for instance, piece-goods and cloth, the agriculturist will get a very low price for his produce. Take cotton for instance. It is no doubt a raw material and every one should wish that it should be manufactured and then sent abroad; but as long as those conditions do not exist in India the producer will surely look forward to getting a higher price for his cotton. If the men in Bombay, Calcutta or Madras will pay say Rs. 10 a maund only, we shall indeed be very sorry and we shall be very glad if Japan or Lancashire comes into the field and gives Rs. 25 or Rs. 35 per maund. I mean to say that as long as the industries of India are not in a position to offer the same prices as the foreign consumer, agriculture will be hit very hard. The same can be said about other forms of produce. Possibly it will have a very prejudicial and injurious effect upon the export from India of other agricultural produce. To start with, it will only benefit a very few capitalists situated in suitable localities such as Bombay, Calcutta and Madras. Therefore I submit, Sir, that it will be unwise to make a move which will benefit only a very very small number of people and will be harmful to a very large majority of the people. My friend, Mr. Kamat, has pointed out, I think quite inadvertently—that 56 per cent. of the people of India live upon industry

Mr. B. S. Kamat: I never said 56 per cent. in India; I said in England

Sardar Bahadur Gajjan Singh: Here as far as is known from the Fiscal Commission's Report 1 per cent. live by industries; the rest of the labour lives by agriculture. So judging from that point of view I think Government will not be well advised in launching this policy of protection. It is admitted on behalf of the Government that the people, especially the middle class people, will have to pay high prices and that the cost of living will be high. India is a poor country, and for that reason I am afraid she will not be able to pay high prices. There is no evidence to show that industries in India have suffered to any very great extent as a result of foreign competition. Indian industries are doing very well indeed, and especially during the war, as was pointed out by the Honourable Mover himself, they have a natural protection, and the profit derived by the industrialists was cent per cent. or perhaps even more. Therefore, I think, Sir, that in the interests of Indian industries, which are doing very well indeed, it is not desirable that another industry, which is already poor and which I am afraid, Government have chosen to neglect, I mean agriculture, another blow should be given to it by the introduction of this policy. Therefore, Sir, I associate with all the remarks that fell from my Honourable friend, Mr. Townsend. I also submit a note of warning to all my Honourable colleagues in this House, that by voting in their zeal in favour of this Resolution, they will be doing incalculable harm to the only industry which is the mainstay of our population, I mean the agricultural industry. Sir, while maintaining on the one hand that industries should be developed, I am not at all in favour of agriculture being in any way prejudicially affected by the introduction of this policy. One thing I should like to make clear before I resume my seat. I should submit a suggestion for the consideration of my friends who live in towns. They must remember that all their trade, all their welfare and all their wealth depends upon agriculture. If they do anything which will go against the interests of agriculture, they will be doing considerable harm to themselves and to the country as a whole. This is a point to which, I am afraid, men of the towns are very seldom alive. (A Voice: "With so much agriculture, the country is still poor.") You cannot help it. You make the country poor by your own action, for instance, in September last, by refusing to remove the embargo on wheat. Of course, there was the stringency of the money market, but that scarcity was simply due to the fact that we could not get that money from foreign pockets. Punjab alone got 9 crores of rupees, and so you neglected all these things. As my friend, Mr. Jammadas, said, the wealth of the country will increase as a whole. Possibly the wealth of Bombay will increase, no doubt, perhaps a hundred times or a thousand times by the introduction of this policy, but the Punjab will starve. In the United Provinces also probably agriculturists will starve, and poor people will die. Therefore, on these grounds, Sir, I think the Government of India will be well advised in not adopting the policy of protection, at least for a great number of years to come. It is unfortunate, but I must bring it to the notice of the Government of India, that they care more for the Press, they care more for those who speak loudly, and they neglect the interests of those whose interests are really at stake, those who cannot speak loudly and who have not such able representatives as other interests have. I therefore strongly oppose the Resolution of my Honourable friend, Mr. Jammadas, and I have great hesitation in supporting the amendment.

STATEMENT OF BUSINESS.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: Sir, I just want to make a statement about the business of the House. We propose to have a rather large order paper for Monday. We propose to keep on the order paper on Monday the Racial Distinctions Bill and we propose to take that up, if the Honourable the Home Member is able to attend to his duties in the House that day. If he is not able to attend to his duties in the House that day, we propose to take up the following business:

- (1) To introduce a small Bill to amend the Post Office Savings Banks Act, 1873, and any other small Bill which may be ready.
- (2) To dispose of a Message from the Council of State regarding the Contingents House-Accommodation (Amendment) Bill.
- (3) To consider and, if the Assembly agrees, to pass the Repealing and Amending Bill and the Currency Consolidation Bill.
- (4) To complete the consideration of the Official Secrets Bill, and, if possible, pass it.
- (5) To take into consideration and pass, if the Assembly agrees, the Bill to amend the Indian Penal Code, commonly known as the White Slave Traffic Bill, the Report of the Select Committee on which was presented to the Assembly on the 8th.
- (6) To take into consideration the Report of the Joint Committee on the Cotton Cess Bill which was presented to the Assembly the other day and to pass the Bill, if the Assembly agrees.

If the Honourable the Home Member is able to attend on Monday, we shall proceed, as I have said, with the Racial Distinctions Bill. We shall again take it up on Wednesday and also on Saturday next week. On Saturday also next week we shall take up the Official Secrets Bill and we hope to be able to finish it, and in that event the other business which I have read out as coming on on Monday will be taken up probably on the following Monday—Monday the 26th.

The Assembly then adjourned for Lunch till Five Minutes to Three of the Clock.

The Assembly re-assembled after Lunch at Five Minutes to Three of the Clock. Mr. President was in the Chair.

RESOLUTION RE ADOPTION OF A POLICY OF PROTECTION.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar (Madras: Nominated Non-Official): Sir, before I speak on the Resolution and the amendment, I should like to say how cordially we worked with the European Members of the Fiscal Commission, and how willingly they sacrificed some of their scruples in order that there might be unanimity on the major points on which we were asked to give our decision; and I want to tender to them my cordial acknowledgments for the way in which they treated us during the discussions in the Fiscal Commission. I wish also to express our satisfaction in that the Government on this occasion have shown their appreciation of the desire of the people that there should be a change in the fiscal policy; Sir, the speech which was delivered by the Honourable Mr. Innes shows that—his Resolution is not half as good as his speech,—his heart is with the people on this question. Sir, on behalf of the Assembly I think I may congratulate the Honourable Mr. Innes on the exceedingly able speech which he has delivered and on the very conciliatory language he has used in his Resolution, although I am of opinion it leaves a great many things unsaid which I should like it to have said. I may point out that the manner in which this Resolution has been brought forward is not very satisfactory. A costly Commission was appointed, it toured round the country and examined a large number of witnesses. A number of issues were submitted for its consideration and it gave its decision on them. The country expects that the Government should make a pronouncement upon all those issues. Instead of that, although my Honourable friend, Mr. Jammadas Dwarkadas, gave notice of a number of Resolutions dealing with every one of the subjects which were submitted for our consideration, the Government has chosen to take up only one of these Resolutions. The result is that we are not in a position to discuss the other problems, problems intimately connected with, problems absolutely necessary for carrying out, the policy which has been recommended by the majority and the minority members of the Fiscal Commission. Sir, I must express my regret that the Government has not seen its way to bring forward a Resolution which would have covered all the issues submitted to us.

Sir, before dealing with the amendment of the Honourable Mr. Innes 3 P.M. I should like to say a word about one of the bogeys which has been raised in this House, namely, that relating to agriculture. I do not know whether my Honourable friend, Mr. Joshi or Sardar Gajjan Singh, know, that I was appointed to represent agriculture. I am not an agricultural labourer. (A Voice: "That makes all the difference.") My friend behind me says that it makes all the difference. But I should like to know whether any agricultural labourer would have been able to follow the evidence—I am speaking of a labourer—whether any agricultural labourer would have been able to follow the discussions and give an impartial decision upon the evidence placed before the Commission.

I tried my best as representing agriculture,—although as I said I am only an employer of labour and not a labourer myself,—to take up the cause of the agriculturist; and I do say that the decision come to by the Fiscal Commission is in no way injurious to the interests of agriculture. I think there is a great deal of misapprehension as regards the position of agriculture. If my Honourable friends had studied the Fiscal Commission's Report they would have found that about 95 millions are actual workers in the field, whereas in industry the number of labourers employed is 13,67,000. Even if there is very extensive industrialisation, ten times as much as we have to-day, the number of people who would be absorbed in industrial pursuits would be about a million or so. Still there will be for agricultural pursuits about 95 millions of people. Do my friends seriously believe that 95 millions of people in this country are not enough for working in the fields? The Honourable Mr. Innes remarked that if the agricultural labourer had been fully represented in this House, it is doubtful whether he would have accepted even the very modest and watered down Resolution which he has put before the House. I demur to what he says on this point. I do not think that the agriculturists, if they have a voice, would in the least object to the report of either the majority or the minority of the Fiscal Commission, and they would certainly not object to the Honourable Mr. Innes' Resolution. On the other hand they would be delighted to find that he has shown such great sympathy and great concern for the welfare of the agriculturists. As I pointed out, there are enough people in this country who can be taken away from agricultural pursuits to be employed in industries; and agricultural pursuits would in no way suffer by these people leaving that class of work. There is another consideration which people do not take note of; and that is this. There have been frequent famines in this country. When the rain fails and the crops fail, the agriculturists find themselves out of employment. If there are a large number of industries, what would be the result? Some member of a working family would find employment in these industrial pursuits and his earnings would be able to supply the other members with their daily livelihood, whereas if all of them entirely depended upon agriculture and there is a famine, they will find that they will have to look to famine camps for their livelihood. And therefore if there are a number of industries and some members of the family find employment in industries and some members in agricultural pursuits, when there is a failure of crops, the person who is employed in the industries will be able to supply the means of livelihood for the persons who have been thrown out of employment; therefore starting industries would be a help to agriculturists and would not be a hindrance. I said before there are enough people, some of them can well be spared for industrial pursuits. On these grounds I consider people are unnecessarily worrying themselves about agriculture being jeopardised. Upon that point I wish my Honourable friends had the whole of the evidence before them and they would then have seen that even agriculturists gave evidence to the effect that by persons being employed in industries agriculture would not suffer in the least.

I turn to the amendment of which the Honourable Mr. Innes has given notice. I must at the outset say that I am very much dissatisfied with the propositions which he, on behalf of the Government, has put forward. Take for example the first of these. He says that he accepts in principle the proposition that the fiscal policy of the Government of India may legitimately be directed towards fostering the development of industries in India, when he, in the next clause says that in the application of the above principle, of protection, regard must be had, etc., the Honourable the Commerce Member apparently believes that the first clause enunciates the principle of protection. I say with respect that there is a mistake in this. Because according to certain economists, industries can be fostered and developed even under free trade, industries can be fostered by State aid, and industries can be developed by Government pioneering; therefore clause (a) does not necessarily imply that the Government has given its adhesion to the policy of protection. It would have been better and more graceful on the part of Government if they had stated in the forefront of their Resolution that they are whole-heartedly in favour of protection, instead of in a left-handed manner and in a grudging spirit bringing in the word "protection" in the second clause.

Sir, if I am in order I should like to move in the first clause the deletion of certain words and the insertion of certain other words. I would suggest that the words "may legitimately" coming after the words "Government of India" be deleted, and after the words "Government of India" these words be inserted: "should be based on protection." The whole clause would then read thus:

I have no doubt after listening to the speech of the Honourable Mr. Innes that that is really his idea, and I do not see why clear expression should not be given to that idea, why this idea should not be placed in the forefront of the Resolution. If he accepts my amendment there will be no difficulty in carrying out this proposition, and I think the whole House will be with him so far as the first clause is concerned.

Sir, as regards the second clause; here again I find there is some defect. (Clause (b) reads:

"That in the application of the above principle, regard must be had to the financial needs of the country" and then it goes on to say:

"and to the present dependence of the Government of India on import, export and excise duties for a large part of its revenue."

Sir, both Sir Campbell Rhodes and the Honourable Mr. Innes have very rightly drawn attention to the need that the past should be buried in oblivion, and that we should not rake it up for the purpose of showing up the differences between Lancashire and India. At the same time, if we allow this clause about excise to remain, what will be the inference? The inference will be that the Government of India's revenue is dependent upon excise, that they can never think of a time when the excise duties can be abolished. If that is the idea, and I think the idea is likely to be generated by the Resolution standing in the terms in which it has been worded, it would lead to considerable heart-burning. I take it, Sir, that everybody is agreed that this chapter in the financial history of this country should be closed; that the excise duty which has been forced on us at the dictate of Lancashire should go. It may be, Sir, that under the present circumstances, having regard to the financial condition of the Government, it is not possible to abolish it. Nonetheless if you allow this clause to remain, it would indicate that the Government for all time to come is dependent upon excise duties and that they do not contemplate that the day will come when the excise duty can be removed.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: What about the word "present"—"to the present dependence of the Government of India on import, etc."

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: But you do not say that there will ever be a time when the excise duty can go. I think therefore, Sir, that the introduction of the word "excise" in this clause is likely to lead the people of this country into the belief that the Government do not contemplate its removal. At any rate, I did not in listening to the speech of the Honourable Mr. Innes, find any passage in which he foreshadowed a time when the excise duty can be removed.

Then, Sir, I come to the third clause:

"that the principle should be applied with discrimination, with due regard to the well-being of the community and to the safeguards suggested in paragraph 97 of the Report of the Fiscal Commission."

Sir, my point is that this clause which relates to paragraph 97 should not be allowed to remain in this Resolution. Those of my Honourable friends who have read paragraph 97 will remember that certain conditions are mentioned there. Then in paragraph 101, in elaborating the reasons which have led to the mentioning of the various conditions, the majority point out that in the case of new industries there should be no protection. Therefore, Sir, if you leave paragraph 97 in the third clause it would lead to the inference that the Government accept the further elaboration by the majority of that paragraph, namely, in paragraph 101 where they hint at the impossibility at any time of protection being given to new industries. If they omit this clause it would still carry out the intention which the Honourable Mr. Innes has in view. It would read that the principle should be applied with discrimination, with due regard to the well-being of the community. Why spoil this Resolution by a reference to paragraph 97, which when read with paragraph 101 suggests that there should be no protection for new industries. Therefore, Sir, I object to those words:

"and to the safeguards suggested in paragraph 97 of the Report of the Fiscal Commission;"

and I hope that the Honourable Mr. Innes will agree to their deletion. Sir, although I think that the words I have objected to are likely to be misunderstood and will be regarded as showing a very grudging spirit on the part of the Government towards the legitimate aspirations of the people of this country who want that their industries should be developed, I must say that a great advance has been made by the Government in assuring us, through their spokesman in this Assembly, that they are prepared to accept a policy of protection for this country. That is a great advance. But I say, Sir, that in order that that pronouncement may be regarded as fully satisfactory and as meeting the wishes of the people, it is desirable that the objections that I have taken to the Resolution should be considered by the Honourable Mr. Innes, and that he should give his consent to the deletion of the words which I have suggested should be deleted. If he agrees to that, he will carry the whole House with him, and that would be a great advantage. Instead of having half-hearted support for his Resolution he will find that the entire House is with him. (An Honourable Member: "It is not enough.") My friend says it is not enough; but from my point of view I would advise my friend to accept the Resolution of the Honourable Mr. Innes, if he would be good enough to accept the various suggestions I have made with regard to this matter. If he does not, he is likely to find the House divided. But having regard to the fact that we are getting from the Government as much as the Government think they can give us,—I would suggest to all my Honourable friends on this side of the House that they should, even though it is found that the Honourable Mr. Innes is not willing to go as far as I want him to go, give their support to his Resolution.

Mr. President: Further amendment moved:

"In the Honourable Mr. Innes' amendment, in clause (a), omit the words 'may legitimately' in order to insert the words 'should be based on protection and should'."

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett (Finance Member): Sir, I should like to ask whether in dealing with this amendment one must confine oneself strictly to the matter of this particular amendment or whether one could traverse rather wider ground.

Mr. President: The Honourable Member has actually moved three separate amendments, but, for the convenience of the House I will put all three together.

Further amendment moved:

"In sub-section (b) of the amendment to omit the words 'and to the present dependence of the Government of India on import, export and excise duties for a large part of its revenue.'"

Further amendment moved:

"In sub-section (c) to omit the words 'and subject to the safeguards suggested in paragraph 97 of the Report of the Fiscal Commission.'"

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: Sir, I very much hope that the Honourable Member will not find it necessary to press these particular amendments. The Government has, in the words of the last speaker, made a very considerable advance, and it will be a pity to cloud the issue by getting into a discussion of the details of the particular phraseology in which that advance is made. I would draw the attention of Honourable Members in the first instance to the word 'present' which already finds a place in clause (b)—"that in the application of the above principle regard must be had to the financial needs of the country and to the present dependence of the Government of India on import, export and excise duties for a large part of its revenue." The fact that the Government at present depends on import, export and excise duties does not in the least mean that the Government will necessarily depend so, shall we say, three years hence. Do it now, an Honourable Member says; but if that is impossible, there is nothing whatever in the phraseology of that clause which implies that any of those particular duties are perpetuated. Now, with regard to the next clause, clause (c), Government has already agreed to eliminate the words 'subject to' and that really makes a very considerable difference. The words 'subject to' made it an instruction to the Tariff Board that it was to introduce a new policy of protection with discrimination subject to those safeguards. Now, it is required to have due regard to those safeguards and I ask any reasonable person who reads clause 97 to say whether any Tariff Board would be so foolish as to start introducing a policy of protection without due regard to those safeguards. I really feel that in the position which we have reached there is nothing in these small amendments which have been suggested.

I would like now with the permission of the House to turn to more general points and continue the debate as a whole. It has been an unexpected debate to one coming from England where the subject of protection and free trade has for some time raised an almost mystical enthusiasm in the adherents of one side or another, an enthusiasm only comparable to the zeal with which people in the Greco-Roman world used to quarrel about the exact nature of the persons of the Trinity. To-day we have had no such discussion. It has been simply a question of the extent and methods of a policy of protection, on which, subject to due regard being had to the interests of agriculture, we all seem to be agreed.

I may perhaps be allowed to make a personal observation at this point. A Member of the Government of India when he speaks on behalf of the Government of India has only a very limited power of expressing personal views. He is an eighth part, or rather less than an eighth part, of a unity known as the Governor General in Council, and he is expressing the views of the Government of India subject to the general instructions of the Secretary of State. There is not much room for very personal views. Some of us, as Mr. Innes has said, have felt considerable doubt as to whether or not the present is a wise moment to introduce protection. I am not one of those who believe that one must be either a protectionist or a free trader; I can never understand why one should be either an Arian or an Athanasian on the question. It has always seemed to me to be a question of time, place and opportunity. I have been able to agree with the free trader that if there were no differences of race, religion, language, nationality, climate or geography between the peoples of the world free trade would be undoubtedly the right policy. But I have never been able quite to subscribe to the doctrine as I saw it stated only yesterday that free trade is the only policy which is consistent with true international morality. At the same time I have never been able to agree with the protectionist when he tells me that it is necessary that everything that comes into the country should be taxed highly, or that it is very bad for a country that it should take payment for its exports by taking imports in return. There is a famous picture in Addison's Spectator of a Tory squire who waxes violently indignant over the new fangled importations that are coming in from every part of the world, and drinks death and damnation to them in a glass of cognac from France !! The question is really one of time, place and opportunity, and I think the House must have been much struck with some observations that fell from the Honourable Mr. Innes about the difficulties of introducing protection into India in the present state of world commerce and industry. I do not want to be ruled out of order by you, Mr. President, by getting lost in questions of exchange and currency, but they really have a considerable connection with this question. It has happened more than once in the history of the world that a nation has gone in for protective duties and has found in quite a short time that somehow or other in some curious way the exchanges have nullified the effects of protection. At a time when all the exchanges of the world are in a state of chaos, at any rate some consideration ought, I think, to be paid to that matter. There is a paragraph, I think it is paragraph 92, in the Commission's Report which makes a passing reference to that, but if I may be permitted to say so, not a very satisfactory reference. However, as I said, a Member of the Government of India has only a limited right to speak his personal views and my object in expressing a doubt as to whether the present is altogether an opportune moment for introducing protection into India was merely to draw attention to the need for caution. I accept whole-heartedly the doctrine that it is India's right to decide what fiscal policy she shall have, and so long as I remain a Member of the Government of India I shall whole-heartedly attempt to assist in the introduction of the policy which India has chosen. That being the position, the House has, I think, the duty to remember that the Government of India must have the responsibility of doing the administrative work of introduction and must be content to go perhaps a little slower than the fastest sailing vessels of the fleet might wish. After all we are embarking upon a sea, which is known to be subject to cyclones and which has many sunken reefs. May it not be wise to steer slowly at first and set a course among the islands near the coast? Of these we have already some knowledge in our existing revenue tariff which it will be foolish to pretend was not already a protective tariff without being either consistently or discriminatively protective. I suggest, therefore, that it is clearly right that the House and the Government working together should proceed cautiously in this matter.

Now, Sir, some criticism has been made as to the constitution of the Tariff Board. I think it was Mr. Kariat who suggested that he would prefer to see on the Tariff Board two Members elected by this Assembly, but he was willing . . . (A Voice: "No, it was the other way.") If everybody is agreed on that matter, I need not further defend the view that Government has taken about the nature of the Tariff Board. It is, of course, quite natural, it is a natural function of every Parliament to be critical of its executive. It is quite right that it should be so. An executive that is not really responsible and responsive to the will of the people constitutionally expressed is a bad executive. It is even more natural that the Assembly should be jealous in the present state of affairs of this executive, which is only in part responsible to the present Assembly. I do not wish to enter into its constitution at this stage, but it is at any rate responsive to the views expressed in this Assembly. I would suggest that the House, in considering this question of a Tariff Board, should throw its mind forward to the day when the executive will not only be responsive but will be responsible to this House. Let us keep faith with the future. It will be a great mistake if at the present moment, during the present transition period we should allow accidents belonging entirely to the transition period to lead us astray. My strong personal belief is that the two main desiderata in a constitution with an executive responsible to a Parliament are that the executive should be thoroughly responsible to Parliament, and that Parliament should not usurp any of the functions of the executive. I would suggest, therefore, that in dealing with this question of a Tariff Board, we should throw our minds forward and consider whether, supposing we had an executive which was entirely responsible to this Parliament, we should not be making a mistake by trying to usurp their function of appointing a Tariff Board which would take from them the responsibility, which after all they cannot shift from themselves, of bringing this policy into execution.

Mr. S. C. Shahani (Sind Jagirdars and Zemindars: Landholders): Sir, I rise to point out that it will be a very great mistake on the part of the House to accept the amendment of the Honourable Mr. Innes in the form in which it stands at present. It has been pointed out by my Honourable friend Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar that the first clause of this amendment is not properly worded, and he has accordingly suggested some amendment to it. I would read the clause and consider the amendment that has been suggested. Mr. Seshagiri accepts the principle that the fiscal policy of the Government shall legitimately be directed towards fostering the development of industries in India. But his suggestion is that it should be based on protection and directed towards fostering the development of industries in India. I thought the industries of a country were fostered either directly or indirectly. They were fostered indirectly by tariffs, and directly by bounties, cash credits, railway rates and in the great variety of other ways indicated in the Report of the Industrial Commission. I therefore suggest that the first clause should be worded thus: "That the fiscal policy of the Government of India shall legitimately be directed towards fostering the development of industries in India by protection and by direct aids". That would be more exact, and that would convey the idea which is intended to be embodied in the first clause.

In the second clause as my Honourable friend, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar, has rightly pointed out, the existence of the word 'excise' will no doubt lead to considerable misunderstanding in the country. Misunderstandings on vital questions should be avoided with special care. So far as I see, if the intention of the Government is to give up excise duty at any future time, it is best not to indicate in this clause that regard must be had to the finances of India depending largely on the collections from imports, exports and excise. Cotton-exercise duty ought to be done away with at once. It has been said by some that it exists in other countries. I have to point out that such a tax exists in very few countries, and that wherever it exists it exists only for revenue purposes. Japan has been often instanced, but we have to remember that Japan not only refunds the excise duty but also pays freight to destination on her manufactured goods which are sent abroad.

Then, Sir, I come to the third part of the amendment, which is really the most important part. With all deference to the Honourable Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar and to my Honourable friend, Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas, I must point out that, while they have felt that there is something wrong about the recommendations of the Fiscal Commission, they have never been able to localise it. The chief defect in the Report of the Fiscal Commission consists in this, that while they recommend a policy of protection, they try to render that policy as ineffectual as possible by loading it with unworkable conditions. They do come forward rightly to answer all the objections that have been raised to the policy of protection being adopted in India—and on this point I feel greatly disposed to congratulate the members of the Commission, particularly the European members, on their having risen above petty considerations—and to give it as their deliberate opinion that the policy best suited to the interests of India is a policy of protection. But while they have done that, we have got to remember that they have sought to neutralise the effect of this policy which they have recommended for adoption to the Government of India. Now how have they neutralised it? I would refer Honourable Members to paragraph 97 on page 54 of the Fiscal Commission's Report that has been read out but by no means duly pondered. Now what is the main recommendation of the Fiscal Commission's Report? Their main recommendation is this. Adopt the policy of protection because it is best suited to the interests of India. But since this will involve sacrifice on the part of the consumer and the interests of the consumer should be protected you must be discriminating, and in order that you should exercise discrimination with regard to industries that may apply for protection, what should you do? You should appoint a Tariff Board which is undoubtedly a very good step suggested by the Fiscal Commission. Probably this recommendation of the Fiscal Commission's Report may be usefully followed elsewhere too, say, in settling the question of State versus Company management. State management finds favour with the people, and I have no doubt that for that the appointment of Boards should be insisted on in order that the State management may be efficiently conducted. A Tariff Board is undoubtedly necessary, but what further do the Fiscal Commissioners do? They lay down that the Tariff Board in fixing the rate of protection must necessarily respect three conditions. And what are these three conditions? I shall read the three conditions. The first is "That the industry must be one possessing natural advantages such as an abundant supply of raw material, cheap power, a sufficient supply of labour or a large home market." That is a valuable condition, though here too I feel disposed to omit the consideration of "labour" and "market" as well. It is a mistaken idea that India suffers from insufficiency of labour. We have plenty of labour, but it is unorganised. And it is for that reason that the foreign capitalist is able to exploit Indian labour. I entered into conversation in regard to this new fiscal policy with the Honourable Member from Champaran only last night, and he told me that the foreigners who have established their plantations there allowed sometimes no more than two pias a day to the labourers that they employed. The question of labour may not therefore be worried about. I would also omit the word "market" because India is a continent and it has, I think, wrongly depended upon a vagarious foreign market disturbed by fluctuating exchanges. It can be self-contained and it is no exaggeration to say that India can find a secure home market quite sufficient for the purposes of all its important industries. I would retain the words "raw material" and "power" only. But yet comparatively that is a small thing and, if my other friends in the House do not go with me, I would be prepared to drop it. Then, I come to the second condition which says: "That the Tariff Board shall afford aid only when an industry claiming protection is able to show that it is not likely to develop at all or not likely to develop so rapidly as is desirable." Now this is a hard condition. I at once state that what is given with one hand is sought to be taken away with the other. Alien interests could easily put up experts to swear that an industry cannot develop at all or so rapidly as is desirable. According to me all that an industry should be required to show is that, although it has possessed natural advantages, it cannot carry on without protection. And this should be quite enough for the Tariff Board. No other consideration should intervene. The third condition is absurd. And that is that an industry should be able to show that eventually it will be able to face world competition without protection. I have known magical results produced in these days. Some time ago it was deemed impossible for a man to fly—he can fly now. But, if we have scientifically developed so far, if to-day our Chemistry can become alchemy in certain respects, I am very doubtful if in the domain of free will we should be able to secure the same results, if we should be able to say beforehand as to what the conditions of world competition will be after thirty or forty years. But even if we are able to divine, do the Fiscal Commission propose that an astrologer or a theosophical clairvoyant should be put on their Tariff Board? It is no use providing these stringent and unworkable conditions, and I draw the attention of my friends here in the House to these three conditions and ask them to carefully consider them. They are represented by Mr. Jannadas Dwarkadas as being a detail but with all respect I beg to point out that the dissenting Commissioners have not taken into consideration the import of these three conditions and have missed the meaning that underlies them, and I therefore beg to propose that here we should adopt the amendment that I have suggested, namely:

1. (a) That for the purpose of rapid intensive industrialization of the country the Government of India adopt a policy of protection to be applied with discrimination along the following general lines:

- (i) Every industry to which protection is given must possess natural advantages in abundant supply of raw material and adequate sources of power.
- (ii) The fact that, although there exist natural advantages for an industry, it has not been started or has not made rapid progress under the existing regime, should be considered sufficient proof that protection is needed in its case to inspire capital with confidence and to make the progress of the industry rapid."

It is said that my amendment is a long one, furnishes the basis for a Bill, is a speech or an essay. My reply is that those who raise that objection have not studied the subject. (Laughter.) I would not mind stimulating laughter by being so positive here. It is true that very probably the force of the amendment that I have proposed will not be realised by my friends and the amendment that has been proposed by the Honourable Mr. Innes will be carried, but let it be remembered that there is at any rate one man to point out that this amendment in its unmodified form is dangerous and that the House would be committing a serious mistake in adopting it. I am not concerned with the issue at all. It is not given to man to command success; he can do more, he can deserve it. I must point the great flaw which I notice in the amendment that has been put forward by the Honourable Mr. Innes. The whole forenoon I have been getting up and I thank my stars that I have at last had an opportunity of saying my say now. I want also to point out that there is a very great omission in the proposed amendment in that no reference has been made to the employment of foreign capital. Now, kindly consider the context. To restrict the consumer's sacrifice to the necessary minimum a policy of protection should be applied with discrimination; and foreign capital is to be freely employed, say the Fiscal Commission. Discriminating protection on the one hand and what is more free employment of foreign capital: what will these two things do? They will minimise the burden that is to fall on the consumer. And therefore you should be very particular about the employment of foreign capital. I wish to point out that the employment of foreign capital is altogether undesirable, that that has caused the economic enslavement of the country, that places like Champaran and Assam have become plantations in consequence of the free employment of foreign capital.

Mr. President: I would point out to the Honourable Member that the discussion of foreign capital is not in order.

Mr. S. C. Shahani: Sir, if it is not in order, I desist, and hope there will be some other opportunity of discussing it. I would also give up on this occasion the consideration of one other question, namely, the question of Imperial preferences. It has been probably deferred for consideration to some other time, and I willingly abide by the arrangement that seems to have been made. I therefore consider one other point, namely, the point of the Tariff Board. If any part of the dissenting Minute is most satisfactory it is that which is devoted to the appointment of a Tariff Board. The dissenting Commissioners have in general rightly pointed out that the Tariff Board should consist of three members of general attainments and two assessors representing the different interests of trade, commerce, and industry. (An Honourable Member: "Not agriculture.") Yes, agriculture too. I say that the minority Commissioners have rightly suggested that the Tariff Board should consist of three members—one Chairman and two ordinary members, and that, whenever further investigation becomes necessary, the Board should call in the aid of two assessors elected by the different Chambers and mercantile associations in the country and that their help should be requisitioned for the purpose of investigating the claims that are advanced by different industries to protection. I say this is an improvement upon the position that has been assumed by the Fiscal Commission and by the Honourable Mr. Innes in this House. I am suggesting a further improvement. The Chairman as suggested by the minority Commissioners should be a lawyer of the status of a High Court Judge for impartial judicial decisions amongst conflicting interests. It is also right that two members of broad views should be elected by the non-official Members of the Assembly who should have a voice in the constitution of the Board. But the representatives of the different mercantile associations should be regular members and not mere assessors. Those who are specialists, businessmen conversant with special industries, will not on that account be necessarily disposed to protect the interests of the industries which are very near to their heart. I would suggest that all the four members should be appointed by the non-official Members of the Indian Legislature. I therefore slightly modify the useful suggestion made by the dissenting Fiscal Commissioners and propose that the amendment which has been proposed in clause (d) by the Honourable Mr. Innes be superseded by the amendment which I have proposed. The amendment which I have proposed is:

"That a permanent Tariff Board, consisting of a trained Indian lawyer of the status of a High Court Judge for its Chairman, two members elected by the Non-Official members of the Central Legislature and two members representing trade, commerce and industry elected by recognised chambers and mercantile associations in India, be created whose duties will be, inter alia, to recommend the rate of protective duty or any alternative measures of assistance, to watch the operation of the Tariff, and generally to advise Government and the Legislature in carrying out the policy indicated above."

I have only one other remark to make, and it is this. The Honourable Sir Campbell Rhodes has emphasised the conflict that would arise between the interests of the consumer and the producer, if the policy recommended by the Fiscal Commission be adopted. He went the length of saying that there was really no conflict of interest between Lancashire and India, but that in India there will be a conflict between the consumer and the producer. I have heard this point made by some others also. I take this opportunity of stating what has been conceived by my own mind as being an answer to such an objection. The consumer must naturally make some sort of sacrifice in order to gain culture, skill and powers of united production. My Honourable friend Mr. Gajjan Singh came forward to say that agriculture would suffer from protective policy. My Honourable friend Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar has given a reply to that. If time were allowed me, I would read a paragraph from the Fiscal Commission's report; but as it may not be allowed me, I merely refer to what has been said by the Fiscal Commission's report on this point. Agriculture, say they, will not suffer. Agriculture will gain, and distinctly too, by the adoption of the policy of protection. I am an agriculturist, and do agricultural labour. You may look at my dress and imagine that I cannot handle a plough, but that is not so. Few cultivators can distinguish between one kind of soil and another better than I do, or select seasons for different cultivations or settle different rotations or . . .

Mr. President: I must ask the Honourable Member to bring his remarks to a close. He is getting irrelevant.

Mr. C. S. Shahani: Sir, if that is not allowable, I make no further reference to it. I only say that I feel convinced that agriculture will gain

4 P.M. by the adoption of the policy of protection. Most of the agriculturists are mere middle-men and it is only few that participate in agricultural labour. Agricultural labourers are not employed throughout the year on agriculture. It is only in very few places that you have perennial canals and it is therefore most common in India that for nearly six months the cultivator has got to do nothing. If industries are created, the agriculturists would benefit, and very largely too. The cultivator is starving. It is a fact that he does not get even the two meals a day to which he is entitled. And if that is so, the sooner India came to be industrialised, the better would it be for the country. It has been said—I do not recollect by whom, I think it was by my Honourable friend, Mr. Joshi, I am not sure, it may have been by Sir Campbell Rhodes; so I won't say by whom—that India suffers from famines. Famines never affect all parts of India at once.

Mr. President: I must ask the Honourable Member to resume his seat. I gave him a warning three minutes ago and he did not bring his remarks to a close.

Mr. S. C. Shahani: I would only take a minute or two more, Sir.

Mr. President: The Honourable Member is perhaps not aware that I have already given him 9 minutes over his time.

Mr. S. C. Shahani: There are others who were given more time.

Mr. President: What did the Honourable Member say?

Mr. S. C. Shahani: Sir, . . .

Mr. President: I ask the Honourable Member to repeat his remarks.

Mr. S. C. Shahani: I thought that others had got more than 20 minutes.

Mr. President: May I ask the Honourable Member what he implies by that?

Mr. S. C. Shahani: I imply nothing. I only refer to the fact.

Mr. President: May I ask the Honourable Member why he refers to that fact?

Mr. S. C. Shahani: In order that my request for further time may be considered.

Mr. President: I pointed out to the Honourable Member that I had already given him 9 minutes over his time, and I warn him now that I shall not again pass over in silence remarks which imply any reflection on the conduct of the Chair.

Mr. S. C. Shahani: I will be as brief as I can, Sir. I will take only a minute or two more.

Mr. President: I ask the Honourable Member to resume his seat. I understand the Honourable Member desired to move his amendment as an amendment of the Honourable Mr. Innes' amendment. If he will show where the amendment should come in the Honourable Mr. Innes' amendment I should be prepared to accept it.

Mr. S. C. Shahani: Sir, I am omitting that part of my amendment which relates to Imperial Preference, that is to say, part (3). I am also omitting that which relates to the Sea Customs Act, that is, part (5).

Mr. President: I am not asking what the Honourable Member is omitting. I am asking where the amendment comes in the amendment of the Honourable Mr. Innes.

Mr. S. C. Shahani: I seek then to suggest that clauses (a) and (c) of the amendments of the Honourable Mr. Innes be replaced by my clause (a). Then

Mr. President: I will allow the discussion to proceed on the amendment moved by Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar in that case.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary (Calcutta: Non-Muhammadian Urban): Sir, in the first instance, I think the House would like to express its appreciation of the handsome manner in which the Honourable the Finance Member has recognized—as a matter of agreeable surprise—that in this House at all events we are not all irresponsible fire-eaters but are occasionally prepared to take a reasonable view of things. I hope others outside this House whether in the press or elsewhere will share those opinions. Government is prepared to go as far as it may in the present circumstances and we in both the parts of the House, I believe, are agreed that no obstructive tactics should be adopted by which what the Government is prepared to concede may be nullified. At the same time one does feel and one is bound to press that the amendments, more than verbal, that have been moved by Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar are necessary in the interests of the situation. Recognizing that Government cannot afford to be more than general in its acceptance of the principle of protection and following up that desire, I think these amendments are more than necessary. Reading the Honourable Mr. Innes' amendment, one thought that Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar and his friends in the minority of the Fiscal Commission had scored a point, because when Government accepted the principle of "protection with discrimination" and omitted the words "along the lines of the Report" about which there was a great deal of ununderstandable dispute between the majority and the minority—I say, one thought that Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar and his friends had scored so far. The moment, however, any details are gone into, even in the way that Mr. Innes' amendment attempts the Government's object^s is, to some extent, nullified. As Mr. Shahani has pointed out, by accepting the principles laid down (they are more than principles, for they are details) in paragraph 97 of the Report, you will be really handicapping the Tariff Board that is to come and not giving them the free hand which they should have if they are to direct our deliberations in the way that they ought to. For these reasons, and without going further into details and confusing issues that have been gratuitously imported into the consideration of this circumscribed Resolution and the amendment of the Honourable Mr. Innes, I should press the Government to reconsider the position and agree to the suggestions of Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar.

Sir, the issues have been confused. One of them is the so-called agricultural issue which is looming somewhat large in our deliberations. I come from an essentially agricultural province, more agricultural I believe than any other in India. Bengal has its own problems. Bengal is however fairly "protected" in economic and industrial matters or shall I say a great deal of "free trade" is there. Its interests on the Fiscal Commission were entrusted to the care of an European merchant, no doubt a prince among them, a Marwari merchant, a very successful merchant, and also a Parsi Professor of Economics. Whoever was responsible for the framing of the personnel of the Fiscal Commission never thought that Bengal might have its own point of view to be put forward by its own representatives. Be that as it may, Bengal has its point of view essentially agricultural as it is. The lower middle classes of Bengal have been and are largely agricultural in the villages. I am one of them, sometimes a labourer of the stamp of my friend, Mr. Shahani. But agriculture has not solved her problems and Bengal wants to be and must be increasingly industrial. It has no other salvation in the near future. Whatever the reasons may be, the lower middle class in Bengal will not take with that zeal to agriculture that will ensure anything like success in life. Unlike in the past it is taking gradually more, however, to industrial and mechanical life. We have more than a promise of that in my Province in the same way as I think they have in the Punjab in spite of what Sardar Sahib Gajjan Singh and Mr. Townshend have told us. I had been recently to the Punjab and I found quite appreciable industrial awakening there along with commendable educational progress all round. Industrial consciousness is coming over the whole of that province which will soon enable its inhabitants to take their place in the industrial life. With its Hydro-electric and other schemes and promising water power the Punjab will take care of itself. I believe that there can be no gainsaying the fact that even in the Punjab the agricultural interests will not be inconsistent with industrial interests. Certainly, in Bengal that is not going to be the case, and that is not the case. Even with regard to agriculture itself, if what is called scientific agriculture is to come, is not that another form of industry. How can agriculture and industry be dissociated like that? We want cheap clothes no doubt—to talk of one only of the many narrow issues raised. We want here protection not only against Lancashire and

[Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary.]

Bombay and Nagpur, but I am afraid sometimes against Clive Street also. We have a representative of it in the House—he is not here, but he is listening to me quietly from a distance in the corridor. We want protection against some of our own so-called swadeshi workers who are piling up the prices of cloth above their intrinsic value. We want protection against all these, and who knows that the Tariff Board is going to give the cloth industry any protection of the kind that cloth dealers are hoping to have? It may give protection to yarn, or to some other branch of the cloth industry, but the finished cloth industry is not likely to have much consideration. Therefore, by raising these false issues let us not get away from the real point. An important advance has been made. We have to be thankful for the smallest of small mercies, and if a man from Mars came to-day and found that we were congratulating ourselves and the Government upon the fact that after near upon two centuries of British rule here we are in a very patronising way told that the fiscal policy of Government "may legitimately be directed towards the fostering and the development of industries in India", he would be more than astonished. Why, that is a common-place, that is, obvious in any country. But we have to accept that small mercy and be thankful. I am not therefore prepared to risk that mercy by moving amendments that may not be acceptable to the Government. For fifty years, certainly for 37 years since the Indian National Congress came into existence, the better mind of India has been asking for protection in some shape or other. Are we now going back upon that? Government is prepared to concede it in some shape, and to concede, in Sir Basil Blackett's language, that we are now to be masters in our own house so far as fiscal policy is concerned. This is another reason for thankfulness. And there is a third. The Honourable Mr. Innes made a statement which must not be lost sight of, namely, that we are perilously near to taxation limits, we have been urging this long and anything that will get rid of further direct taxation is welcome. The way in which Mr. Innes' amendment has been framed, even when amended by Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar, will not bar those other aids to industrial development that many of my friends have referred to. But protection should be placed in the forefront of our programme, and that is why I believe Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar is wanting to move the amendment in a pointed manner and that is why I believe the Government ought to accept it. I do not want to labour points that have already been dilated upon, but I want to make it quite clear that whatever class versus class differences may be, whatever province versus province differences may be, whatever other differences may be, the country is fairly united that some protection of the kind that has been indicated is necessary, not alone in the interests of industry but also in the interests of agriculture which must go hand in hand together. If protection is really bad for agriculture I should not have it at any price. These considerations commend the amendment of the Honourable Mr. Innes, subject to the further amendment of Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar, to most of us. If Government saw its way to accept Mr. Jamnadas's original motion and added clause (d) of the Honourable Mr. Innes's amendment to it, the object of the Government and ourselves would have been better attained. Mr. Jamnadas's Resolution is fairly general. It covers nearly all the ground covered by clauses (a), (b) and (c) of the Honourable Mr. Innes's amendment. If it is permissible to do so, I should recommend that Mr. Jamnadas's Resolution shall stand and be amended by addition of the Honourable Mr. Innes's amendment, clause (d).

so that the whole object aimed at by Mr. Jamnadas and the Honourable Mr. Innes which is also our object, so far, may be achieved.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: It will be convenient if at this stage I explain the view of the Government in regard to Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar's amendment. I do not propose to refer to Mr. Shahani's speech except to say that that speech illustrated a danger which I think is a real one. If every one here to-night worded the Resolution so as to embody his own particular brand of protection, every one of us in this Assembly would have his own Resolution, and we should never come to a finish at all. In this very difficult matter I say that there must be a reasonable spirit of give and take and that being so I hope Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar will withdraw his amendments. I must confess that I listened to Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar's speech with a certain amount of disappointment. He said that the Government had made only a grudging advance. He said that we had so worded our Resolution that it was open to misconstruction and misunderstanding. Sir, on my part, I may say that I do not think that any reasonable man reading my Resolution can misunderstand it at all and I say that if there is any misunderstanding it must be a wilful misunderstanding. The first clause of my Resolution has been attacked on the ground that it does not bring in the word protection. It has been suggested by Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar that under cover of this clause I am probably referring only to other methods of giving assistance. Sir, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar, when he made those remarks, entirely overlooked the word 'fiscal'. I say that the fiscal policy of the Government of India may legitimately be directed towards the development of industries in India. Sir Deyva Prasad Sarvadilikhary accuses that as being a patronising reference to India. It is nothing of the sort. What is the point of that clause. Surely this House will give us credit for the fact that every line of this Resolution has been most carefully thought out and the reason why clause (a) of the Resolution has been worded like that is to mark the transition, the profound transition from a purely revenue tariff to a tariff which is directed to other objects and that is why the Resolution has been worded in that way. I come to clause (b). Here again Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar says that clause (b) has been so worded so as to give people the idea that we propose for ever to keep on the cotton excise duty. Nothing of the sort. I explained at the very greatest length in my last speech why we had put in this reference to the financial position. I explained that it would not be honest for us to pretend that in the present state of our finances we could pledge ourselves to take off the duties referred to by the Fiscal Commission and that is why I put in particularly the words 'the present dependence.' We are not discussing the question of cotton excise duties at all in this Resolution. It has nothing to do with this Resolution. All we are discussing is whether or not this House is to admit the principle of protection. That is the whole point. Again we come to clause (d). Mr. Shahani has found all sorts of dangers, all sorts of dishonesties on the part of the Government of India in this reference to the safeguards in paragraph 97 of the Indian Fiscal Commission's Report. Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar suggested that because I made a reference to paragraph 97 I must have had in my mind a reference to paragraph 101. I had no idea of the sort. Any one will see, as Sir Basil Blackett has pointed out, that this suggestion that the Tariff Board must have regard to these safeguards is a perfectly reasonable suggestion. No Tariff Board considering questions of this kind could avoid paying regard to the considerations mentioned in paragraph 97 of the Fiscal Commission's Report. As I pointed out in my last speech, all that paragraph refers to is the doctrine of comparative advantage. Can Mr. Shahani or any one in this House suggest any better criterion than that? I do not think I need say more. We have on this side made a fair and even generous advance in order to meet the wishes of this House and the wishes of the people of India. I do not think that it is generous on the part of the House that it should make small and niggling amendments in the wording of my Resolution. As I have said, every line of this Resolution has been most carefully thought out and I must ask the House to accept that Resolution as it stands. I am afraid that if Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar presses his amendments then I must oppose them and the responsibility will not be mine. Sir, I oppose the amendments.

Dr. H. S. Gour: I move that the question be now put.

Mr. President: The question is that the question be now put.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"That in the amendment moved by Mr. Innes in clause (a) the words 'may legitimately' be omitted and that the words 'should be based on protection and should' be inserted in their place."

The motion was negatived.

Mr. President: Further amendment moved:

"That the words in clause (b):

'and to the present dependence of the Government of India on import, export and excise duties for a large part of its revenue' be omitted."

The motion was negatived.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: Having regard to the fate of these amendments I do not press the other amendment.

Mr. President: Further amendment moved:

"That in clause (c) the words 'and to the safeguards suggested in paragraph 97 of the Report of the Fiscal Commission' be omitted."

The motion was negatived.

Mr. P. P. Ginzwa (Burma: Non-European): Sir, somehow to-day I do not feel the least enthusiasm over the subject which is being debated, for by what I can see there is very little ground on which there is really much controversy. The points that are under debate are really two as the Honourable Mr. Innes has more than once pointed out. Is India committing itself to the principle of protection? That is one point; and the second point is—if it is going to commit itself to the principle of protection—does she wish that part of the machinery to give effect to that principle shall be the constitution of a Tariff Board?

Now it was said this morning,—and I think it is believed by most Honourable Members,—that to-day we are burying the policy of free trade, and that we are giving it a decent burial with the Honourable Mr. Innes as one of the principal pall bearers. But the question that I should like answered is this. If free trade is dead to-day, and it is going to be buried in a few minutes, has protection really come to stay? Now I am not very sure that the way we are proceeding about it to-day leads me to think that protection, even if a Resolution approving of it is passed by this august Assembly, is going to stay for ever. I see no indication of any element of permanence in the proposition that has been made either by my friend, Mr. Jaminadas Dwarkadas, or the amendment moved by the Honourable the Member for Commerce and Industries. For what does it amount to? We pass a Resolution that the future fiscal policy of India shall be on the lines of protection. We then say that we should constitute a Tariff Board to give effect to it. But what is there which gives any sanction either to the first Resolution or to the second Resolution? What is there to prevent this policy being set aside by a subsequent Resolution of this House, and what is there to prevent this Board being also wiped out by a subsequent Resolution of this House? Now, Sir, the point that concerns me most is this,—if we are going to embark upon a policy which is going to break with the past wholly and which is going to inaugurate a new era, the House must safeguard itself against fluctuations of political views in this Assembly and outside. I am not in a position to suggest how this House is going to accomplish that; but I venture to think that the mere passing of these two Resolutions will not ensure that permanence which is essential to the growth of this fiscal policy on which this House is about to embark. It is also necessary that some legislative provision be made by this House by which this House pledges itself, so far as itself is concerned, to adhere to this policy. Unless this is done I do not consider that we should be wise in venturing upon this policy, for there are no precautions taken against its reversal at any time. I put the question in this way. Take the Tariff Board. The Honourable Mr. Innes says, the Board shall come into existence and shall remain in existence for a year.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: In the first instance.

Mr. P. P. Ginnala: Of course in the first instance for a year. But we do not know what is going to happen to that Board at the end of the year. Many of us may not be here at all to hear the fate of that Tariff Board. It is not merely a bogey I am raising; it is a real fact that you have got to reckon with. If our friends outside the Council who have kept out of it change their minds, as they are about to change, we hope, you may be certain that this would be one of the election cries—and it must be an election cry—as to whether the Honourable Mr. Innes with his Tariff Board and we with our support should be allowed to come back to this House or not. I venture to submit, Sir, that before any violent changes are made in the policy of the country, sufficient provision must be made to ensure its permanence, and I submit, that this is not the way to do it. I have said before in this House, and I have not changed my opinion since, that I am a protectionist to the core; but I do not wish to be a protectionist to-day and be changed into a free-trader by the sheer brutal force of votes next year. That is the thing we have got to guard against. (An Honourable Member: "There is no danger of that.") There are gentlemen here who are so sanguine as to suppose that there is no danger of that. Well, I foresee the danger myself, though it is not that I wish that the House should not embark upon this policy of protection. That is not my wish. My wish is that something more tangible than a mere Resolution should come from the Government, so that at least for a reasonable period we are committed to this policy of protection.

Then, Sir, with regard to the constitution of the Board. Now I am not a great believer in any bureaucratic form of Government.

The Honourable Mr. A. C. Chatterjee (Education Member): Nor do you believe in a democratic form of Government.

Mr. P. P. Ginwala: My Honourable friend says, that I am not sufficiently a democrat. But there is this to distinguish real bureaucracy from real democracy, that the bureaucracy will not improve nor is willing to improve upon somebody else's ideas. Democracy has this affliction about it, that it wants to improve everybody and it wants to improve upon everybody else's ideas. This being so, let us consider whom we should prefer. What would happen if democracy prevails and this principle of election is adopted in the constitution of the Board? Those Members who are elected by the House will be subject to the influence of the House. We cannot get away from that fact; we need not disguise it. They must come under the influence of the House. Again the House itself, in its turn is bound to come under the influence of the outside world. This will not be so in the case of the bureaucracy and I submit, that in the conflict between these two principles and under the peculiar circumstances of this case, I would prefer the bureaucracy and confer on it the power of determining the constitution of the Board. But, Sir, I would go further. I am not impressed by the fact that the mere passing of a Resolution constituting this Tariff Board is sufficient. If this Board is to be constituted it should be a statutory body, constituted by an Act of this Legislature, and that its duties as far as possible should be defined. I object to treating the Board merely as an advisory body. For in the end it may come to this, that it may advise as much as it likes the protection or otherwise of a particular industry, but if its advice is to be submitted to the opinion of the whole House, I venture to submit, without meaning any offence to this House, that that advice will not more often than not be examined on its own merits. There are always political forces at play, under whose influence the advice is bound to come. If their advice is to be subjected to the scrutiny of the House on each occasion, it would be better that the advice had better not be tendered. We have seen, and it is a legitimate exercise of our powers—we have seen on many occasions how much we have got a tendency to doubt to scrutinize and amend the reports of all Select Committees. That I say is legitimate in legislation, but when one comes to the examination of an important department of business, the examination should be from a business, and not from a political point of view as would be the case, if it was undertaken by this Assembly. I maintain that is a thing to be avoided, and if the Honourable Member for Commerce is desirous that this Tariff Board should be a really live Board with possibilities in itself of doing good, it should be a statutory Board exercising statutory authority, by which this House and the outside world may be bound for a reasonable period of time. There is another point. In the elements of permanence to which I referred there is the attitude of one gentleman, the gentleman who sits in Whitehall with a big stick in his hand over the heads of my Honourable friends on the Treasury Benches; we have heard nothing at all as to what his ideas and intentions are and what he means to do. (Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: "He has no voice.") We think he has got no voice, but I should like to have an official statement made that he is going to give up this big stick in his hand so far as this aspect of administration is concerned. I have heard nothing about it. I should like to hear from the Honourable the Commerce Member what is the position of this gentleman going to be with regard to any Resolution that this Assembly may pass to-day. We have been just told by the Honourable the Finance Member, that Members of the Government have got very little scope for the expression of personal opinion; we know it and we feel it pretty often; but we want really to know what is the official information on this question. Is this gentleman going to take his legitimate position in the machinery of the Government of the country, or is he going still to persist in interfering with our affairs when his interference is not required? I put a plain question to the Honourable Member for Commerce and I shall expect a plain answer.

Sir, these are some of the few matters which have rather made me feel some anxiety about the future fate of the policy we are adopting by the Resolution which is before the House. It may be that I do not understand economics in the way in which my Honourable friend to my right (Mr. S. C. Shuhani) claims to do, but I think I am entitled as much as anyone else to know from the commonsense point of view what our position is going to be hereafter; whether if free trade is dead protection has come to stay?

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: Sir, we have now before the House my own Resolution and as against that the amendment of my Honourable friend, Mr. Innes. We have heard speeches from many Honourable Members, some supporting the Resolution, others supporting the amendment, and others criticising both; and I am called upon now to exercise my right of replying to the debate that has followed my moving this Resolution. I shall try and take my Honourable friends one by one. I shall deal with Government last. I shall first take my Honourable friend, Sir Campbell Rhodes, one of my esteemed colleagues on the Fiscal Commission. I must at once say that with the exception of one point that it seemed to me he made, my Honourable friend, in spite of differences of opinion—and I still maintain that they are small differences—has treated me more or less fairly; but I must insist on telling him something about one point that it seemed to me he made, and that was to the effect that considerations of racial hatred had shown themselves in the conclusions at which we arrived. Now I at once deny the charge. I deny it Sir Campbell Rhodes: On a point of explanation, Sir, may I assure the Honourable Member that those were not my remarks? I referred to evidence given before us, but to any action in the Commission itself.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: I am glad, Sir, that my Honourable friend has explained his position. But even on behalf of the witnesses themselves I am not prepared to admit the fact that they were moved by racial considerations in dealing with this question on which the voice of India had spoken long, long before this House ever ventured to take the matter into consideration. It is a question that has been discussed on its own merits by every one who has discussed it, and I refuse to believe that any one of all the witnesses that came to give evidence before the Commission introduced the element of race in putting forward his views before the Commission. Then my Honourable friend made another point and said that I maintained the position that when India became self-contained famines would disappear. I was surprised to hear that from my Honourable friend. I never for a moment maintained that. In a limited sense, so far as the necessities of life are concerned, I do believe that India can reach a position of being self-contained, and it will reach that stage if proper encouragement is given to industrial development in this country. So far as famines are concerned, I maintain that if pressure on land is diminished by a portion of the people who now belong to the agricultural class diverting their energies to industrial labour, then it is likely that the resisting power of the people will increase and they will be able to bear famines more than they have hitherto done. With regard to the other points referred to by my Honourable friend, I have nothing to say. He has presented his own point of view, but fundamentally I find that there is an agreement between us so far as the general conclusion with regard to protection is concerned. Now, I must come to my Honourable friend, Mr. Joshi. Believe me, Sir, I never expected that my friend, Mr. Joshi, who is supposed here to represent the interests of labour of the poorer classes of the community, not by election but by nomination of the Government, would ever put forward views that would be most detrimental to the interests of the poor classes. I was wondering what it was that had influenced Mr. Joshi's views so as to enable him to present a case, pretending of course that it was a case for the poorer classes, but which was most detrimental to the interests of the poorer classes. I was wondering what it was that had influenced him. (Mr. N. M. Joshi: "Have you found out?") And it then dawned on me that perhaps his going to Washington and Geneva nominated as he was by the Government of India to represent the cause of labour had perhaps removed him to a large extent from touch with the poorer population here and had brought him in the midst of the surroundings of those pleasant labour gentlemen of other foreign countries whose views on the question as to whether India should have a policy of protection or free trade would not be acceptable to any portion, to any class of people belonging to this country. We know that the people who would most resent the adoption of a policy of protection would be perhaps the class which seems to have influenced my Honourable friend, Mr. Joshi's views. I want to assure Mr. Joshi this, that if I had not known him I would have for a moment thought that he was here representing the views either of Lancashire labour or of Lancashire merchants and that he was not in any way advocating the cause of our country. (A Voice: "No, no.") I am entitled to my view. I find fault with his judgment, not with his motives; but believe me, Sir, that it has really pained me to feel that Mr. Joshi's prejudice against capitalists goes so far as to make him use this momentous occasion for emptying himself of the hatred that, it seems to me, he has generated in his breast against these "wretched classes". I hope Mr. Joshi will realise that the country is much greater than any of the classes that constitute this country. I hope Mr. Joshi will take a leaf from the book of his own late leader Mr. Gokhale and make up his mind to study the speeches and writings of that great respected leader and try to give something of his views both to the people and to the Government which of course will be to the advantage of this country.

Then, Sir, I come to my Honourable friends from the Punjab. Both my friends from the Punjab, Messrs. Townsend and Sardar Bahadur Gajjan Singh seem to imagine that an adoption of the policy of protection will hurt the interests of the agriculturists. Now I do not want to go into the details of their arguments, but it seemed to me when my Honourable friend, Sardar Bahadur Gajjan Singh was arguing, that he was arguing against himself. He maintained that if industries were set up in this country and if a demand for raw materials increased in this country, then the agricultural interests would suffer. I could understand my Honourable friend bringing that argument forward if the Fiscal Commission had recommended that an embargo should be placed on export or even that an export duty should be resorted to, but the Fiscal Commission, as I pointed out in my opening remarks, has deliberately excluded export duties from their recommendations. Now what will be the result of the establishment of industries here? The demand for raw materials would increase in this country. Not only that, but a competition would be set up for securing those raw materials between this country and the foreign countries. I ask my Honourable friend whether the agriculturists are going to gain or lose by the existence of that competition? When the demand is greater and the supply remains the same, do the prices go up or do they go down? Will it stimulate the agriculturists to pay greater attention to their crops and increase their production or will it dishearten them and compel them to give up growing their crops? I personally believe that the policy of protection, if adopted will not compel the agriculturists to suffer in any way, but it will bring greater prosperity to them. But apart from that, even to-day we realise that the pressure on land is so great and so many more men than necessary are engaged in agriculture that there is an insistent demand to provide for them in their spare moments facilities for resorting to cottage industries like handloom, and so on. If we draw a certain number of people, a very small fraction of the population for industrial labour, even then, I submit, there will be a large number of people left who will be required to pay attention to the carrying on of cottage industries in the villages.

Then lastly, I come to my Honourable friend, Mr. Shahani. Mr. Shahani, I think, has attempted to give views which he thinks are beneficial to the interests of this country. He referred to the question of the constitution of a Tariff Board and said that the constitution of a Tariff Board, as suggested by my Honourable friend, Mr. Innes, would not be desirable and is opposed to the recommendation made by the Minority Report. I admit that that is so, but I will, when dealing with the speeches of my Honourable friend, Mr. Innes and my Honourable friend, Sir Basil Blackett, deal with this aspect of the question of the constitution of a Tariff Board. Let me now come to the amendment of my Honourable friend, Mr. Innes. I agree with my Honourable friend, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar, that the Government have shown a great deal of wisdom in approaching this question in the spirit in which they have done. I agree with my Honourable friend, Mr. Ginzala, that in addition to the remarks made in his personal capacity by the Honourable the Finance Member, a more definite statement ought to have been made by the Government to the effect that hereafter the Secretary of State will never interfere in the fiscal policy of the country when the Government of India and the Indian Legislature are in agreement. I hope my Honourable friend will take the opportunity of making that statement before this debate is closed to-day. Then, I said that my Honourable friend had approached the subject in a good spirit. I maintain that, because I believe, and I think Honourable Members will do well to keep this in mind, that the present transitional constitution of the Government of India provides that in all matters in which there is an agreement between the Government of India and the Indian Legislature, in those matters alone, so far as the fiscal policy is concerned, the Secretary of State will not interfere. An obstructive attitude on the part of my Honourable friend, the Commerce Member would have perhaps made it difficult for us to get the policy of protection in some form or another adopted in this House. He has made our course easier, and I have reason to believe that the Government have been able to do so, perhaps because the present Secretary of State has respected the convention established by the late Secretary of State and not interfered with the decision of the Government of India. Now, I wish my Honourable friend on behalf of

[Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas.]

Government had gone far enough as suggested by my Honourable friend, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar. I believe, for instance, he should not have shirked to introduce a more definite language in his Resolution boldly proclaiming the adoption of a policy of protection for this country. I know that he has done so in spirit. I know that in his Resolution,—whoever reads it—he cannot conceal that,—he accepts the policy of protection as recommended by the Fiscal Commission. I know also that in the speech that he has made he has given expression fully to the view that Government to all intents and purposes have accepted the policy of protection. But I wish that nothing should have persuaded him to keep back that boldness which ought to be the characteristic of every Resolution, either when it is framed by Government or by any Member of this House. However, as I look more to the substance than to the shadow, I have no hesitation, as a practical man, in accepting the wording as suggested by him, especially because he has accepted certain changes which were suggested to him. Now, coming to clause (b), I labour under the same difficulty under which my Honourable friend, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar, laboured. His amendment is lost and I have no right to refer to it. But I want to make it clear that by accepting the clause—"the present dependence of the Government of India on import, export and excise duty for a large part of its revenue," we should not be taken to mean that we have for all time to come blessed the present method of taxation which is resorted to by Government. With that reservation, I have no hesitation in accepting that clause. With regard to the third clause, the omission of the words "subject to" alters the character of that clause and I feel that the Tariff Board will be called upon only to pay due regard to those conditions and it will not be insisted that they should rigidly apply those conditions for all time and in all cases. If this is the meaning, I have no hesitation in accepting that. And now, lastly, I come to the question of the constitution of the Board. I must explain the reasons which led the minority to make the recommendation which we made. We again were faced with the difficulty of making some arrangement for the transitional period. Until we reached self-government, so long as we have an Executive which is not responsible to the people, it is very difficult for us to accept a Board which is nominated by a Government not responsible to the Legislature. We were faced with that difficulty. We know that there is no constitutional precedent for such a Board being elected by Members of Parliament or the Members of a popular House. But no other country is faced with the difficulty of going through a transitional period, as we are faced. We have here an irresponsible Executive controlled, as it were, obnoxiously very often, by the Secretary of State and we have an elected majority in the House. How are we going to compel the hands of Government to make an appointment which is acceptable to us? Well, it is that which led us to make a recommendation that the Board should be elected. However, I think we should not insist on that being carried out, especially after the remarks that have been made by my Honourable friend, Sir Basil Blackett. For I am free to admit that, in cases where that gentleman from Whitehall, of whom my Honourable friend, Mr. Ginwala, has so eloquently spoken, in cases where he has not continuously interfered with Honourable Members of the Government, may have behaved much better with us. And, as I believe in the dictum that "trust begets trust," I feel that we shall be acting wisely in showing our trust and confidence in the Members of the Government and hope that they will use this trust well and see to it that the appointment that they make on this Tariff Board would be such as would be acceptable to the Members of this House. And in doing so, I beg of them not to allow "foreign" influence to bear upon them. (An Honourable Member: "Outside influence.") By "foreign" I mean the influence of the gentleman from Whitehall who does not know much about India and who continuously thrusts his finger in everything that is being done by the Government of India. We had a very sad experience in the appointment of the Royal Commission. I wish I were free to admit, like my Honourable friend, Sir Basil Blackett, that Government has always been responsive, if not responsible, to the wishes of the Legislature. Our experience in the 5 P.M. case of the Royal Commission has been too recent and too sad to cheer us up with that kind of statement. But we hope, at any rate, so far as fiscal matters are concerned, we shall have no interference from that gentleman from Whitehall and that we shall be masters in our own house and that we shall be left to decide matters as we like ourselves. But I may also warn the Government that, if they do not use the trust well in this matter, they will find it difficult to deal with this House in other matters, because they have got to deal with this House on every question and, once it is shown that the trust is misplaced, which I hope it will never be, then this House knows how to deal with the Government in questions that will come up to us for decision in future. So, to all intents and purposes, I am prepared to accept the amendment of my Honourable friend, Mr. Innes.

And, last but not the least, I want to touch one of the arguments that has been advanced.

Mr. President: I cannot let the Honourable Member advance a new proposition.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: This is not a new proposition. I will bring my remarks to a close, Sir. Mr. Ginwala complained that, while we were busy burying free trade, he did not know whether the new House would not bury protection. I do not think that the new House will do that. I do not think that any new House is going to bury protection for a long time to come. But, if it does so, none of us is bureaucratic enough to question the power of the Legislature in this country to bury any policy that this House is launching upon.

Sir, before I sit down, I want again to express my gratitude to the Government that, although not quite fully, at least in spirit they have largely met in this instance the desire of the Legislature. I feel as if I could say to my Honourable friend, Mr. Innes, that the long-lost brother has after all come back to the fold, that the policy which India has insisted on for a long number of years in the interests of this country, to which Government at the dictation of Whitehall turned a deaf ear, is accepted by Government, and I agree with Mr. Innes that it is an epoch-making proposition and that we are starting a new era in this country. I repeat that it seems to me that, if this Resolution is accepted, it will be a red letter day in the history of this country and I may take, if I may be permitted to do so, legitimate pride in the fact that I had the honour to initiate this discussion.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: Sir, I think that Mr. Jamnadas has exhausted my time as well as his own and therefore I will not detain the House for more than a moment. Mr. Ginwala appeared before the House in his usual impersonation of a doubting Thomas. He wanted to know what is the good of our passing a Resolution of this kind? He pointed out that that policy, even though we approved it to-day, might be upset by the Assembly of this time next year. Well, Sir, I can give him one answer to his question. The use of passing this Resolution which I have put to the House is this, that it pins down at any rate the Government of India to that policy. Mr. Ginwala also stated that he was a democrat. I must confess that, when I heard his views about the Tariff Board I felt very much inclined to doubt that statement. He apparently contemplates a Tariff Board with Statutory powers over and above the Indian Legislature, a Tariff Board which is empowered to fix rates, a Tariff Board which is beyond criticism by this Assembly. Well, Sir, that may be a very efficient Board but it is not democracy, nor, Sir, is it the sort of Board that I should agree to appoint. One more point and I have done with the Honourable Member from Burma. He challenged me to say what action His Majesty's Secretary of State for India would take in regard to my Resolution, if it is passed by the House to-day. Sir, the only answer that I can give to that question is this, to refer the Honourable Member from Burma and other Members of this House to paragraph 33 of the Joint Select Committee's Report, and to the Despatch of the 30th June 1921, in which Mr. Montagu, on behalf of His Majesty's Government at Home, accepted the principle recommended by the Joint Committee. Sir, Mr. Jamnadas's speech ended in a note of harmony. Mr. Jamnadas ended up his speech by saying that he was prepared to accept my amendment. I hope, Sir, that the whole House will adopt the same attitude in regard to this amendment. Only time can show, Sir, whether we are wise or not in the decision we are taking to-day, but I have one thing to say. We have adopted this policy and, as far as the Government of India are concerned, we are determined to carry it out in earnest.

Mr. President: The original question was that :

" This Assembly recommends to the Governor General in Council that a policy of Protection be adopted as the one best suited to the interests of India, its application being regulated from time to time by such discrimination as may be considered necessary by the Government of India with the consent and approval of the Indian Legislature."

Since which an amendment has been moved to substitute the following after the words " Governor General in Council " :

" (a) that he accepts in principle the proposition that the fiscal policy of the Government of India may legitimately be directed towards fostering the development of industries in India ;

(b) that in the application of the above principle of protection regard must be had to the financial needs of the country and to the present dependence of the Government of India on import, export and excise duties for a large part of its revenue ;

(c) that the principle should be applied with discrimination, with due regard to the well-being of the community and to the safeguards suggested in paragraph 97 of the Report of the Fiscal Commission ;

(d) that in order that effect may be given to these recommendations, a Tariff Board should be constituted for a period not exceeding one year in the first instance, that such Tariff Board should be purely an investigating and advisory body and should consist of not more than three members, one of whom should be a Government official, but with power, subject to the approval of the Government of India, to co-opt other members for particular inquiries."

The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: The question is that the Resolution, as amended, be adopted.

Sir Montagu Webb: May I, at this stage, make a slight verbal amplification, namely, the addition of the word "Indian" before the words "Fiscal Commission?" The Report of the Fiscal Commission, I have been told, is going to mark an epoch in the great Free Trade controversy, and I should like the name of India to be associated with it.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: I have no objection, Sir.

Mr. President: Further amendment moved:

"That before the words 'Fiscal Commission' in sub-section (c), the word 'Indian' be inserted."

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: The question is that the Resolution, as amended, be adopted.

The motion was adopted.

The Assembly then adjourned till Eleven of the Clock on Saturday, the 17th February, 1923.

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.

Saturday, 17th February, 1923.

The Assembly met at the Assembly Chamber at Eleven of the Clock.
Mr. President was in the Chair.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

STATEMENT OF "NEW INDIA" ON RESOLUTION RELATING TO INDIAN AUTONOMY.

358. Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas: (1) Has the attention of the Government been drawn to the following paragraph headed "Which is true" in New India of the 29th January?

"Sir Malcolm Hailey told the Legislative Assembly that no despatch was sent by the Government of India to the Secretary of State along with the Resolution of the Assembly demanding the curtailment of the ten-year limit. But the Bengalee's Special Correspondent at Delhi is responsible for the statement that the wishes of the Government of India, and particularly of Lord Reading, have been overridden by Lord Peel not only in connection with the appointment of the Services Commission, but also in the matter of the proposed revision of the Reforms Act. The Bengalee understands that the Viceroy submitted "a reasoned despatch" to the Secretary of State "urging a further extension of the Reforms," and our contemporary is disposed to accept this statement as likely to be accurate. If it is a fact that Lord Reading's Government was in favour of an extension of the Reforms Act it would only place the Government right with the people of India, and we are entitled to know who is our enemy and whom we have to attack. The people of India would like to know whether the statement of the Bengalee correspondent is accurate."

(2) Is the statement made by the Special Correspondent of the Bengalee true? If not, will the Government of India be pleased to state the true facts?

Mr. H. Tonkinson: The statement of the special correspondent of the Bengalee is not correct. The Resolution was sent to the Secretary of State with a forwarding letter only.

INCHCAPE COMMITTEE.

359. * Mr. K. O. Neogy: Will Government be pleased to state the probable date of the termination of the work of the Inchcape Committee?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: I understand that the Committee hope to finish their inquiry by the end of this month.

Mr. K. O. Neogy: Is it a fact that a part of the Report has been received by Government?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: Yes, Sir.

Mr. K. C. Neogy: When is it going to be published?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: About the time of the Budget it is hoped to publish it.

WITNESSES EXAMINED BY INCHEAPE COMMITTEE.

360. Mr. K. C. Neogy: (a) Will Government be pleased to state the names of witnesses examined by the Incheape Committee?

(b) Was there any non-official among the witnesses?

(c) Will Government publish the evidence given by these witnesses?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: I am informed that no record has been kept of the witnesses. In some cases when the reports given by departments to the Committee required to be supplemented, the Heads of departments were informally examined.

The answer to the second and third parts of the question is in the negative. No complete record has been kept of the informal discussions above mentioned.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: Is it a fact that it was first given out that the Committee would not examine any witnesses, but would receive only written statements of those who desire to give evidence?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: I am afraid I am not in a position to answer that question; I do not know.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Were the witnesses who were examined named by the Government of India specifically or was the matter referred to the Local Governments to send in evidence to be examined by this Committee?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: I do not think the Local Governments had anything to do with the question.

Mr. K. Ahmed: The Honourable Member did not understand the first part of my question, Sir. Did the Government of India name those persons who were examined, and if so what was the principle that was adopted in selecting persons to be examined in camera?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: The answer to the first part of the question is in the negative, and the second part, therefore, does not arise.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Then, how did these people come here and how were they examined? Did any unknown person whisper in the ears of those persons who were examined as witnesses to come and give evidence here?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: The Honourable Member has asked so many questions that I do not know which one to answer. But the Incheape Committee examined such witnesses as it desired to examine.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Who decided the point? Was it the Committee which selected the witnesses or was it the Government? If it was done by the Committee, under what principle, and if it was done by the Government, how did Government select the persons?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: The Incheape Committee, on the principle of examining those people who they thought would be useful, examined those people.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Do I understand that Government was not a party and that the Chairman and the Members of the Committee selected the persons?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: The Government gave the Committee free scope to make such inquiries as the Committee thought desirable.

Mr. K. Ahmed: That is not the answer. The Government should have given the names.

STAFF OF INCHEAPE COMMITTEE.

361. Mr. K. O. Neogy: (a) How many Secretaries, and Assistant Secretaries have the Incheape Committee got?

(b) Is there any Indian in any responsible position in connection with the Incheape Committee, excepting as Members thereof?

(c) What are the positions of Messrs. Mant and Brayne respectively in connection with the Incheape Committee, and what are their respective salaries?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: (a) There is one Secretary (Mr. Howard) and an attached officer (Mr. Milne).

(b) No Indian officer has been formally attached to the Committee, but amongst other Indian officers who have been connected with the investigations I may specially mention Mr. Mitra, Financial Adviser, Military Finance, who has been closely associated with the Committee in their enquiry into military expenditure.

(c) Mr. Mant was Secretary to Government in the Retrenchment Office during the preliminary enquiry and since the Committee has been sitting, he has discharged the duties of liaison officer between the Departments of Government and the Committee. His pay is Rs. 4,000 a month, as Secretary to Government. Mr. Brayne is an officer of the Finance Department deputed to afford the Committee such assistance as they may require. His pay is that of his regular appointment as Deputy Secretary, i.e., Rs. 2,350 a month.

CALCUTTA PORT TRUST.

362. Mr. K. O. Neogy: (a) Have Government received any proposal from the Government of Bengal for the amendment of the constitution of the Calcutta Port Trust, specially with a view to increase Indian representation thereon?

(b) If so, are Government in a position to make any statement indicating the views of Government in this matter?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: (a) Yes.

(b) No. The legislation necessary to give effect to any changes in the constitution of the Calcutta Port Trust is a matter for the Government of Bengal.

MOTOR HAULAGE AND ALLOWANCE IN DELHI.

363. Rai Bahadur G. C. Nag: Is it a fact that Members living in Metcalfe House are allowed motor haulage and motor allowance of Rs. 75 per mensem? Is it a fact that Members living in Delhi city are allowed no conveyance allowance of any kind? On what ground is the discrimination justified? Who made the rule, and when was it made?

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Members living in Metcalfe House are entitled to draw motor haulage but not the conveyance allowance of Rs. 75 per mensem. If the Honourable Member will refer to Legislative Department Circular No. LXV, dated the 18th May, 1921, he will notice that the conveyance allowance of Rs. 75 per mensem is admissible to those who live at Raisina. It is a fact that Members living in Delhi City are not entitled to conveyance allowance. As Members living in Metcalfe House are not entitled to conveyance allowance there is no discrimination.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Is there any allowance given for haulage, Sir, to people living in Delhi but neither at Raisina nor at Metcalfe House?

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: I must ask for notice of that question.

Mr. K. Ahmed: if that is so, is there any sense, Sir, in not paying conveyance allowance to people living anywhere in the town?

Mr. President: That is a matter for argument.

Mr. N. M. Joshi: I should like to know, Sir, the reason why people living in Metcalfe House should be given motor haulage, if it is not a conveyance allowance. I should also like to know from Government whether they remember that during the last Budget discussion, the Honourable the Law Member at that time promised to inquire into the question as to why a Delhi Member should not get conveyance allowance.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: The Honourable Member's question seems to mix up two separate things. Motor haulage is given to a Member to enable the Member to bring his motor to Delhi. The conveyance allowance is given to a Member to enable him to run his motor about Delhi. With regard to the Delhi Member, I have not got the papers, and I should like to have notice of that question.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Is it the principle followed here that Members coming here and living in Metcalfe House will get motor haulage and not the people living in the town?

Mr. S. C. Shahan: Will a Member coming from the mofussil to Delhi and residing in the city of Delhi be entitled to motor haulage?

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Certainly.

CANCELLATION OF MANGALORE MAIL.

364. Mr. K. Muppli Nayar: 1. Is the Government aware that by cancelling the Mangalore Mail, the South Indian Railway has done a great disservice to the travelling public of the West Coast of India.

2. In view of the great trouble and worry to and consequent dissatisfaction of the public, do the Government propose to advise the restoration of the Mangalore Mail as soon as possible?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: 1 and 2. The attention of Government has been drawn to a letter in a newspaper indicating that the changes in the time table have not met with public approval but beyond this they have no information. The matter is one which is within the competence of the South Indian Railway Administration, but has been taken up with the Agent.

Mr. K. Muppli Nayar: Do I understand, Sir, that we have no control in the matter? Has the Assembly no jurisdiction in the matter?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: I have already stated that this is a matter which is within the competence of the South Indian Railway Administration.

SIND MOHAMMADAN CONSTITUENCY FOR COUNCIL OF STATE.

365. Mr. Ahmed Baksh: Will the Government be pleased to state the following:

- (a) The date on which the nomination papers for the Sind Mohammadan Constituency for the Council of State were put in during the last bye-election;
- (b) The date of scrutiny and polling;
- (c) The date on which the result was announced;
- (d) The date on which Mr. Ali Buksh Mohammed Husain, M.L.A., put in his resignation and also the date on which it was accepted;
- (e) Is it fact that under the Council of State Electoral Rule 5 (c) a person is not eligible for election if he is a Member of any legislative body; if the answer is in the affirmative will the Government be pleased to state how Mr. Ali Buksh Mohammed Husain was elected to the Council of State?

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: (a) 21st November, 1922.

(b) 23rd November, 1922, and 20th December, 1922.

(c) 21st December, 1922.

(d) 25th December, 1922, and 10th January, 1923.

(e) Yes. The Bombay Electoral Regulations do not allow the returning officer to reject a nomination on the ground that the candidate is barred under rule 5 (1) of the Electoral Rules.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Is not that, Sir, a violation of the rule under which, if a candidate stands for election, his seat should be left vacant?

Mr. President: If the Honourable Member expects an answer, he must make his question intelligible.

Mr. K. Ahmed: A violation of the rules under which a candidate is to be returned to this Assembly; that is that, unless he vacates his seat in the Legislative Assembly, he cannot be a candidate for the Council of State.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: What is not a violation of what rule?

Mr. K. Ahmed: A violation of the electoral rules of the Council of State.

Mr. Ahmed Baksh: Does this rule apply only to Bombay or to other Provinces as well?

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: I believe the position is the same under all the electoral regulations. I may as well admit that this recent case has revealed a defect in the rules, and the matter is receiving attention.

Mr. K. Ahmed: Is it not a fact that the Commissioner of Sind referred this matter by a telegraphic message to the Government of India asking whether nominations cannot stand according to the rules of the election of the Council of State.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: So far as I am aware, Sir, that is not a fact.

Mr. Muhammad Yamin Khan: What will be the position of the present Member who has been elected to the Council of State? Will it be considered to be a valid election or not?

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: If no election petition has been presented against his return within the period allowed his election is presumably valid.

Mr. Muhammad Yamin Khan: What will the Government consider it without an election petition? Will the Government consider it to be valid or not?

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: The Government is not concerned in the matter; it is the electors of the constituency who are concerned.

Mr. Ahmed Baksh: Under the electoral rules a person who is already a member of another body cannot stand for election, also a female cannot. Supposing a female has been elected, if there is no election petition what would be the situation then?

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: As regards the female it would be a matter of opinion. As regards the case of a Member who is already a member of a Legislative body, I have already said there is a defect. In fact the electoral rule which says that a Member who is already a Member of a Legislative body shall not be eligible for election to another Legislative body is possibly inconsistent with a section of the Government of India Act which distinctly contemplates that a sitting Member of one House of the Indian Legislature may stand for election for the other House. That is section 63E (2).

UNSTARRED QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

ARMY MARRIAGE ALLOWANCES.

184. Rai Bahadur G. O. Nag: (a) In the Army Budget what are marriage allowances to families in England, of British personnel serving in India? Since when have these allowances been granted, and why?

(b) Will Government kindly furnish a statement showing the marriage allowances paid to families of British personnel during the past 10 years?

(c) Are any such allowances paid to Indians? If not, why not?

(d) Are amounts paid as marriage allowances recoverable?

Mr. E. Burdon: (a) and (b). Marriage allowance forms part of the remuneration of the married British soldier, wherever serving. The allowance was introduced from the 4th October, 1920, and has its origin in certain allowances which had to be paid to the British soldier during the Great War in order to secure the personnel required. The conditions on which marriage allowance is granted are stated in an Army Order a copy of which I will give to the Honourable Member separately.

A statement showing the rates of marriage allowance paid to the families of British troops serving in India when the families are respectively (a) in the United Kingdom and (b) in India, is laid on the table.

(c) No. Marriage allowance is merely a part of remuneration and the terms of service at present in force for the Indian soldier are sufficient to secure efficient recruits in adequate numbers.

(d) No. It is only the family allotments which are recoverable, i.e., the amount which the soldier himself is required to contribute in order to qualify for marriage allowance.

Statement showing the rates of marriage allowance paid to the families of British troops serving in India when the families are respectively (a) in the United Kingdom and (b) in India.

RAISINA HOSTELS.

185. Rai Bahadur G. C. Nag: Is it true that both Eastern and Western Hostels are proposed to be given over to the Postal and Telegraph Departments? If the answer is in the affirmative, will Government kindly state the reasons for the decision?

Colonel Sir Sydney Crockshank: The Honourable Member is referred to paragraph 22 of the Report of the New Capital Enquiry Committee, 1922, copies of which have been placed in the library for the information of Members. The recommendations of the Committee are under consideration.

LONGWOOD HOTEL, SIMLA.

186. Rai Bahadur G. O. Nag: Is it a fact that the Longwood Hotel at Simla was originally purchased for accommodation of the Members? If the answer is in the affirmative, will Government kindly state how many rooms there are in the Hotel, and how many of them were given to the Members and how many to outsiders during the past two Simla Sessions?

Colonel Sir Sydney Crookshank: "Longwood" was originally purchased for the accommodation of Members of the Indian Legislature. There are 54 quarters in all, 3 of which are reserved for management and superintendence. Of the remaining quarters in 1921 the whole were placed at the disposal of the Members, but only 31 were occupied. In order to reduce the annual loss to Government on these quarters, 15 have been made available for occupation by Government officials throughout the year and certain other quarters during non-session periods. Of the 36 quarters available for Members of the Legislature, 31 quarters were in occupation during the autumn of 1922.

LOSSES ON ASSAM-BENGAL RAILWAY.

187. Rai Bahadur G. O. Nag: (a) Is it a fact that the Assam-Bengal Railway has been working at a loss since it was opened in 1895 to date, and under terms of contract with the Company, the Government have been bearing the losses which amounted to Rs. 30 to 40 lakhs annually in addition to paying interest at 3 to 3½ per cent. on the Company's share-capital of £1,500,000? If the figures are incorrect, will Government kindly state what the correct figures are?

(b) Will Government kindly state what was the amount paid in interests and losses separately to this Company during the past 5 years, and under what head of budget the payment appears?

Mr. C. D. M. Hindley: (a) The Assam-Bengal Railway has been working at a loss since it was opened in 1895, the annual losses being in respect of interest charges; except that in 1895 there was a small loss in working. Attention is invited to the figures given in the History of Indian Railways, copies of which are available in the Library of the Legislature.

(b) The amount paid to the Company annually for interest is £45,000 being the guaranteed interest at 3 per cent. on the Company's share capital of £1,500,000. There have been no losses payable to the Company during the last five years. The payment of guaranteed interest appears under the head "Interest on Capital contributed by Companies" and is included in the figure for interest charges shown in the Demand Statement presented to the Assembly.

IMPORT OF MOTOR CARS, BICYCLES AND TRICYCLES.

188. Mr. Darcy Lindsay: 1. Will Government state if it is a fact that during the first 9 months of the present fiscal year whilst the number has increased the value of imports of motor cars has considerably decreased in comparison with the same period of 1921-22 and is nearly four crores less than in 1920-21 and that the import of the British car has become reduced to only 10 per cent. of the total.

2. Is it a fact that during the same period the value of imports of bicycles and tricycles is in round figures 12,57,000 as against 8,89,000 in 1921-22 and 25 per cent. of the 1920-21 imports.

3. Do Government propose to re-examine the position with a view to re-adjusting the import duty on motor cars on a more equitable basis.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: 1 and 2. The figures given by the Honourable Member are substantially correct.

3. The effect of the present rates of customs duties has been fully considered by the Government of India in connection with the forthcoming budget, but the Honourable Member will not, I am sure, expect me to anticipate my Honourable colleague, the Finance Member's budget speech.

RESOLUTION RE KING'S COMMISSIONS FOR INDIANS AND INDIANISATION OF THE ARMY.

Mr. President: The Assembly will now resume the discussion of the resolution moved by Mr. Muhammad Yamin Khan, which is as follows:

"This Assembly recommends to His Excellency the Governor General in Council to be pleased to get King's Commissions for Indians by direct recruitment and by promotion from the rank of Viceroy's Commissioned Officers in such number that all vacancies in the Indian Regiments be in future filled by such Indian Officers only till all Indian Regiments are wholly Indianised."

To which an amendment has been moved:

"That for the word 'and' the word 'or' be substituted, and that the word 'all' before 'vacancies' be omitted, the word 'only' after the words 'Indian Officers' be omitted, and the word 'wholly' before the word 'Indianised' be omitted."

The question is that that amendment be made.

His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief: Sir, with your permission I desire to make a statement to the House. Speaking in this Assembly on the 24th of January last, I expressed the hope that it would be possible to announce at no very distant date what measures are to be adopted in regard to the Indianisation of the Indian Army. In the short interval that has elapsed the correspondence which I then said was proceeding has been concluded, and I am able to announce to the House the following decision. The Government consider that a start should be made at once so as to give Indians a fair opportunity of proving that units officered by Indians will be efficient in every way. Accordingly it has been decided that eight units of cavalry or infantry be selected to be officered by Indians. This scheme will be put into force immediately. The eight units to be wholly Indianised will be mainly infantry units, but there will be a proportion of cavalry. They will be chosen judiciously so as to include as many representative types as possible of Indian battalions and cavalry regiments of the Indian Army. Indian Officers holding commissions in the Indian Army will be gradually transferred to Indianising units so as to fill up the appointments for which they are qualified by their rank and by their length of service, and the process of Indianising these units will then continue uninterruptedly as the officers gain seniority and fitness in other respects, which will qualify them for the senior posts. I have given the House these few details because I think they will be of interest as revealing some of the practical aspects of the change. There is one other point, however, which it is necessary for me to explain. It is that, simultaneously with the Indianisation of these selected eight units, Indians who qualify for the King's Commission will continue as at present to be posted to the other units of the Indian Army. The number of Indian cadets now sent to Sandhurst each year, if all pass out successfully, is more than sufficient to replace the normal wastage in the eight units alone. I draw attention to this matter as it is of significance which the House I am sure will not fail to appreciate. Once more, before sitting down, I wish to express my gratification that this great step forward has been made. I hope that the people of India will appreciate the importance of this step and will realise also that it now rests with them to justify the decision of the Government. I hope that no effort will be spared to make the measure which has been approved a solid and a conspicuous success. The responsibility which lies before these young men who will officer the Indianised regiments, is no light one. They will have in their hands not only the lives of their men, but also the task of maintaining untarnished the high and ancient traditions of the regiments to which they are appointed. I can assure them that in the new and in the wider career which will now lie open to them, they will have the active and the generous support of the Government of India and of their British comrades in the Army. Their success or their failure will mean much to India. The initiation of this scheme constitutes an entirely new departure which, though limited in its scope, is one which may have far-reaching results. I trust that the Members of this Legislature and that the people of India as a whole will support the Indian officers of these Indianised regiments with living and with practical encouragement, for by this means only can Indianisation hope to deserve and to command success.

Mr. Muhammad Yamin Khan (Meerut Division: Muhammadan Rural): May I ask His Excellency one question? How many units are there out of which these eight units are to be Indianised?

His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief: I thought I made it clear that there would be eight units.

Mr. Muhammad Yamin Khan: I wish to know how many units there are in the Indian Army out of which these eight units are to be Indianised?

His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief: The total number of units in the Indian Army are 120 infantry and pioneers and 21 cavalry.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar (Madras: Nominated Non-Official): Sir, the information which His Excellency has given this morning and the speech which he delivered on the last occasion render it absolutely necessary that I should press the amendment of which I have given notice. Sir, His Excellency has just now told us that the correspondence between the Government of India and the Secretary of State on this subject has been concluded; and, therefore, there ought to be no difficulty in placing that correspondence on the table of this House. Sir, more than a year ago I asked a question in this Assembly of the Government as to whether they would be prepared to publish the correspondence relating to this subject

Mr. President: Is the Honourable Member moving his amendment?

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: Yes.

Mr. President: I think I must dispose of Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary's amendments before we come to that. I understood he was rising to meet the new situation which has been created by the statement of His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief.

The question is that for the word "and" in the second line of the Resolution the word "or" be substituted.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. President: The question is that the word "all" before the word "vacancies" be omitted.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. President: The question is that the word "only" after the words "Indian Officers" be omitted.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. President: The question is that the word "wholly" before the word "Indianised" be omitted.

The motion was negatived.

(Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar rose to continue his speech.)

Mr. S. O. Shahani (Sind Jagirdars and Zamindars: Landholders): Sir, I have been authorised by Munshi Iswar Saran . . .

Mr. President: Order, order. Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: I will resume my remarks. Sir, as I said, the information given this morning renders it necessary that this House should have before it all the correspondence that passed between the Government of India and the Secretary of State. His Excellency has told us that out of 141 units in the Indian Army the Government of India have selected 8 units for being officered by Indians. That gives a proportion of 1 to 17. Sir, it is not doles of this kind that this House and the country would value. What we want to know is what is Government's definite programme which they and the Secretary of State have agreed upon, and whether that programme should not be laid on the table of this House for our criticisms and our suggestions. Unless they give us the details of the scheme sent by them to the Home Government, and, unless they tell us what their considered opinions were, and how far they have been either accepted or rejected by, what Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas would have called "the gentleman at Whitehall," until we know something of the nature of the correspondence that was carried on between the two departments of the same Government, we will not be in a position to give our adhesion to the scheme that may be outlined. Sir, this is a matter of great constitutional importance. I take it, Sir, that this Legislature, the Government of India and the Secretary of State are the three component parts of a united administration. If that is so, I do not see what necessity there is for one branch of the administration being kept in ignorance of what is going on between the other two branches of the administration. The Government will recognise in what a false position they are placing this Assembly by not placing before it all that passes between themselves and the Secretary of State. We have often been told by those who are not friends of the Government, by others who consider that we are not being treated properly, that we are not really representing the people and that the Government has no confidence in us. That accusation receives strength from the fact that the Government do not take us into their confidence. We have been asking times without number to be informed of what is passing between them and the Secretary of State. Every time they return the answer that it is in the correspondence stage and that they are not prepared to publish the correspondence. Why should not the correspondence which passes between the Secretary of State and the Government be laid on the table of the House, so that we may be in a position to know whether they represent the wishes of the people, whether they voice the considered opinion of the people; we want to be in a position to offer them such suggestions as may enable them to make further representations to the Secretary of State. If they do not do that, what is the position? We are considered as of no value by a certain section of our countrymen and the Government are regarded as irresponsible; it is believed that it is the Secretary of State who is ruling the whole country and that it is he and he alone can determine what our fate should be. Sir, the other day the Leader of the House made a statement which has enabled many a newspaper to have it as the headline of an article, namely, that this House is often not proceeding on facts but on suspicions. I wish, Sir, that the Leader of the House may soon be here and that his illness may soon be cured, because nobody feels his absence more than Members on this side of the House. Sir, who is responsible for the Assembly and the country basing their conclusions upon suspicions and not upon facts? Do the Government give us any facts? Do they ever place before us any data? Do they ever admit us into their confidence? Naturally, the result is that we are groping in the dark. We get some information from newspapers occasionally. The newspapers seem to have their confidence more than the Members of this House. We take our facts from these newspapers and we begin to spin out a theory which we believe is the one which has commended itself to Government. Under these circumstances, is it any use twitting us with proceeding upon suspicions and not upon facts, when we are not enabled to have the facts before us? I say this is a matter of grave constitutional importance and I ask Government how long are they going to keep the Assembly in ignorance, and how long are they going to keep everything that passes between them and the Secretary of State from us? If they continue in this mood, we shall regard it that they have no faith or trust in us; that feeling will be reciprocated; we cannot trust them if they do not trust us. Sir, that is the reason why I have added to the Resolution which was moved by my Honourable friend an amendment in these terms. There is, by the way, a printer's error in it. Instead of the word "substituted" the word should be "added."

That for the Resolution as it stands the following be added:

"This Assembly recommends to the Governor General in Council that he may be pleased to lay on the table of the House the scheme, if any, for the Indianisation of the Indian Army and the correspondence, if any, that has passed between the Government of India and the Secretary of State for India on the subject."

Sir, it is no news to His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief, nor is it news to the Government of India, that the whole of Asia is waking up. You will find in Japan, in China and everywhere there are National Armies officered by men belonging to the nation. It is only in India that we do not find the same thing; and unless Government enable us to officer our Army, unless they Indianise the Army itself, it will be impossible for us to be able to resist any invasion that may come to India from those quarters; and I think it is in the best interests of the Government that they should take the people of India into their confidence and enable us to assist them in giving our own views as to the best means of Indianising the Army. Until they do that, there will be no feeling of trust or confidence in them. Sir, His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief on the last occasion said that he was exceedingly pleased with the conduct of the Indian Army, exceedingly pleased with their discipline; and he paid a glowing tribute to their general conduct. May I add to the testimony borne by His Excellency the testimony of one of his predecessors, Sir Charles Monro, in regard to the Indian soldier? There is no doubt there is good material in this country which can be developed and from which officers can be drawn who will be able to command the various units. This is what Sir Charles Monro stated in one of his despatches:

"The character of the terrain combined with arduous and trying climatic conditions alone presented difficulties before which the most hardened troops might well have desisted. The resistance of the enemy has been broken and the difficulties successfully overcome by a force composed almost entirely of Indian troops. No British troops, except for the Royal Air Force and a British Battery of Mountain Artillery was employed."

This fact has without doubt considerably raised the prestige of the Indian Army on the Frontier and increased the esprit de corps of the troops engaged. Sir, as I said, His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief has paid a similar tribute to the Indian Army.

Now if you find that the rank and file of the Army are so well equipped and so well able to withstand the enemy and in a position to render a good account of themselves, what is the difficulty in finding men from the ranks, what is the difficulty in promoting men from the ranks, to be officers in the Indian Army? His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief seems to think that it is almost impossible. We used to hear the saying in our schooldays that in France every soldier carries with him the possibility of becoming a Marshal, and if it was possible in France to get superior officers from the ranks, it should be equally possible in India to promote men of acknowledged ability from the ranks to be officers. I read sometime ago that in England there is a scheme for promoting from the ranks persons to the position of Captains and so on. If that is to be done in England, why should you not make the same attempt in India? The answer is "It is an uncertain factor and we do not know whether it will prove successful or not." My reply to that is this: If you do not try, if you never make the attempt, you will always be labouring under this difficulty. You must make an attempt, you must honestly endeavour to give Indians a chance of proving their mettle, a chance of showing that they can be not only good fighting men, but also good leaders of men. Government have not given them the least chance of doing that, hitherto, and that is the reason we do not find them holding important positions. I ask Government, Sir, to remove these suspicions from their mind and by their confidence in our soldiers, and by promoting them to responsible positions take the country with them. Sir, His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief on the last occasion used this language, namely:

"Do not try to run before you have begun to walk."

Sir, I agree with that maxim; but I would say: "Please give us an opportunity of standing up." If you do not help us to stand up, how can we walk at all? Government do not give us any chance, any opportunity of showing that we can stand up and walk a foot or two. If they do not enable us to do that, there is no use in telling us that we are trying to run before we can walk. When you give us the chance, if you find us stumbling in walking, you can then say "Do not walk so fast." But when you do not enable us even to get up, then you have no right to say that we are trying to run before we can walk.

Sir, I will conclude as I began. There is no use in giving us a few dribblets as was promised this morning. What we want to know is, what is Government's considered scheme? What is it they are going to do with the Army, and in what period of time do they expect that the whole Army will be Indianised? What is the suggestion, the advice, given by His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief? How has it been received by the whole Council of the Government of India, including the Indian Members who have been in the Executive Council? What has been the advice that they have given? Has that advice been accepted by the Secretary of State or has it been turned down? That is what we want to know. His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief just now turned his pencil towards my friend the Honourable Mr. Sarma, and I think he might as well point to the Honourable Mr. Chatterjee. They are no doubt there in the Executive Council. But, Sir, you will find that when Indians are in such responsible positions, it is almost impossible to get the slightest information from them. I can get some information from you, from His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief. I can occasionally go to the Honourable the Finance Member, and also to the Honourable the Commerce Member for some information. But if I go to Mr. Chatterjee or Mr. Sarma, all that they tell me is "Don't jeopardise the position of Government, don't embarrass the Government." Those are pot expressions of theirs. You cannot get any thing out of them. Under these circumstances, I say it is impossible to ask any of my countrymen in the Council of the Government of India to give us any information as to what has happened. They will not; and if the Government of India come to the conclusion that no correspondence is to be placed on the table, the whole country will be in the dark, and nothing about the steps which have been taken will ever come out from the Indian Members of the Council. I ask Government seriously and in all earnestness to place the whole correspondence on the table so that they may not allow us to remain in this unfortunate position of being told by our countrymen that we are not in the confidence of Government. Sir, it is necessary to enable us to attain Dominion Self-Government in future that we should have all the information available to the Government and the Secretary of State. Sir, I move the amendment which is standing in my name.

Mr. President: Before I put the motion, I must draw the Honourable Member's attention to the fact that his motion is in the form of a Resolution which he himself sent in and which is, so to speak, meant to stand on its own feet. Now as an addition to the Honourable Member's Resolution it does not fit very well. I do not rule it out, but I think it will require some change to make it a reasonable amendment. I do not think the Honourable Member has quite taken into account the fact that it is not a good practice to use a substantive Resolution as an amendment to another Resolution.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: May I say, Sir, that the only word which it will be necessary to add is the word 'further' ?—"That this Assembly further recommends, etc., etc." If you would allow me to add that word there, it will make matters clear.

Mr. President: Even with the addition of that word, what the Honourable Member appears to contemplate is the laying on the table of the scheme and subsequent discussion of that scheme, whereas the Resolution asks, not for laying on the table or for discussion, but for instant action. If one is really an amendment of the other, I would assume that the word "substituted" was the correct word.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: May I explain, Sir, even before the original Resolution came up for discussion I informed the Secretary of the House that I did not want to substitute mine for the original Resolution, but that I wanted it to be an addendum to the original Resolution. I gave that information long ago; it was not yesterday or the day before yesterday; I did this about a fortnight ago. My object in putting this amendment forward is this: it is not only the Indianisation of the Army we want; we also want to know the exact programme, the scheme of Indianisation which the Government of India and the Secretary of State have resolved upon. It is for that purpose that I want that the correspondence should be placed on the table, so that we may be in a position to know not only how far Indianisation has proceeded, but also what were the concrete proposals made by the Government of India which were either accepted or rejected by the Secretary of State. That is why I wanted to have the correspondence laid on the table. Under these circumstances I think, Sir, that my Resolution may be regarded as an amendment in the sense that it is an addition to the existing Resolution. And it does not contravene the main Resolution; it only adds to the requisition contained in the original Resolution.

Mr. President: Then it is the Honourable Member's intention that the scheme should be laid on the table for discussion and that at the same time, the Governor General should be recommended to take instant action in the direction recommended in Mr. Yamin Khan's Resolution?

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: Yes, Sir. The language is perhaps not quite clear, but that is my idea.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"That to the Resolution the following be added:

'This Assembly further recommends to the Governor General in Council that he may be pleased to lay on the table of the House the scheme, if any, for the Indianisation of the Indian Army and the correspondence, if any, that has passed between the Government of India and the Secretary of State for India on the subject.'

Mr. Muhammad Yamin Khan: May I ask, Sir, if the Honourable Member who has moved the amendment in addition to my Resolution is willing to number my Resolution as (a) and his amendment as (b)?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes (Commerce and Industries Member): Sir, my Honourable friend, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar, expressed his regret at the absence of the Leader of the House to-day. I can assure him and this House that his regret is nothing as compared to mine. If Sir Malcolm Hailey were here, I should be sitting in my seat and watching Sir Malcolm Hailey intervening in this debate with that debonair unconcern which marks all his interventions. As for me, I feel just like a man who is about to poke his head into the proverbial hornet's nest. Fortunately, Sir, my task, though it may not be a very palatable one to this House, is not a very difficult one. I propose to confine myself entirely to Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar's amendment. Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar asks that all the correspondence relating to this subject may be placed on the table of the House. He has complained that unless we do this, the constitution under which we are working is bound to breed only suspicion in the Members of the House. Sir, it is not my purpose to discuss that constitution. I see no useful purpose in discussing that constitution. Whatever the defects of that constitution may be, the constitution is there, and we have to work it and we have to make the best of it. There is only one answer to this amendment of Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar. Even if the Government of India wished and were prepared to meet Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar and to lay this correspondence on the table, we could not do so. We cannot lay that correspondence on the table without the express and previous concurrence of His Majesty's Secretary of State for India. We have not got that concurrence and that is the only answer I can give to Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar. If the House passes this amendment, naturally it will be communicated to the Secretary of State, but I can give no indication of any sort or kind as to what the Secretary of State's answer may be. I am afraid, Sir, I can give no other answer to Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar's amendment.

Mr. B. S. Kamat (Bombay Central Division: Non-Muhammudan Rural): Sir, I shall venture to offer a few remarks with reference to the action which Government have been good enough to announce that they are prepared to take, and I shall also venture to indicate the lines on which the aspirations of the people are at present running. In the first place it is my duty, I think, to thank His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief for the announcement he has made and for the small mercies which Government have decided to show to this country. I do not wish to go into general propositions, but shall go into a few details, chiefly with a view to elicit more information from His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief. In order to do so I think I shall have to take stock of what this House decided two years ago, what Government did during the interval and whether what Government are prepared to do at the present moment meets with our satisfaction. This House two years ago in 1921 on a Resolution of Sir Sivaswamy Aiyer decided, and Government also accepted, that His Majesty's Government should admit Indians to all the different arms of His Majesty's forces. Now that means that Indians should be admitted to the Air Force and to the artillery among other branches. In the announcement which His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief has been pleased to make this morning, I find he has not told us whether, as a result of the correspondence which Government had with His Majesty's Government, they have come to any decision on these two points. If I understand Indianisation of the Army aright, Indians must be trained to defend the country in all its branches. They must be trained to use their intelligence in the Air Force and in the artillery and to command in these arms. I wish to know whether any decision has been arrived at on these two points. During the last two years I recognise that Government have done something; a Military college has been opened at Dehra Dun; a few military schools in connection with that college are contemplated and Government have also framed certain regulations for admission to the Dehra Dun college which is a preparatory and preliminary college for cadets being sent up to the Sandhurst College at Home. Now, when the Proposer of the Resolution and the Mover of the amendment opened up the principle that the vacancies in the Indian Army should be all filled up by Indian officers, I do not know whether they threw any light, or sufficient light, on what we wanted, or what they meant by Indianisation on the principle of filling up vacancies.

As far as I can find out the figures, Sir, the present British officers in the Indian Army are as follows: In the cavalry they are 548, and in the infantry they are 2,688, making a total of something like 3,200 British officers in the Indian Army. So far as the artillery is concerned the whole of that arm of the forces is officered by British service men. It is not open to officers of the Indian Army, if I am correct. Taking therefore this figure 3,200 as the total of officers which eventually according to the goal we have in view we have to replace by Indians, I am not quite able to follow His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief when he announces that 5 units will be thrown open to Indians. I want to know in terms of so many officers what proportion it bears, not to the total number of units or regiments but to the total number of posts of British officers, because after all what we want to do is to replace eventually all these British officers in the Indian regiments by Indians; what we are more anxious to know, therefore, is how soon this total of 3,200 officers, or at what reasonable date this total number of 3,200 officers will be capable of being replaced by Indians according to the present process of intake at the Sandhurst College, or the intake and the flow at the Dehra Dun College. That is precisely the position. Now, in order to understand that and in order to find out whether our process of Indianisation by training at Sandhurst is adequate, whether the pace is rapid or slow, we must know how many cadets have been turned out, how many have passed out of the Sandhurst College during recent years. Now, I do not know whether it would be perfectly relevant to go into the figures before the year 1919. But I believe for the purpose of comparison it is germane and pertinent to know how many cadets are being turned out from the Sandhurst College and whether the flow is adequate enough to replace the 3,200 officers in a reasonably short period of time. Now, the number who passed out of the Sandhurst College in 1919 were 2 in the spring term and 4 in the autumn term, in all 6. Those who passed out in 1920 were only 2. Those who passed out in 1921 nil. And I believe in the spring of 1922, 2 people were under training there. So that at the present moment only 18, or to take the most up-to-date figures perhaps 23 people are under training in Sandhurst. Now, if my figures are correct, I should like to know whether you can replace 3,200 people, by the process of filling vacancies occurring amongst them; I doubt if this process will Indianise the Army at a reasonably early period. Now, I do not know what the percentage of vacancies per annum is to the total number of officers. I am not aware whether it is taken on the actuarial basis or on some other basis, but, even taking the ordinary actuarial basis of the percentage of vacancies to be say 3 or 4 per cent, the vacancies after all will be very few; I think it is no use attempting to Indianise the Army by filling in only the vacancies as and when they occur. In other words, the process of Indianisation by filling in vacancies is rather a very very slow process indeed. What, therefore, is necessary is to withdraw British officers from the Indian regiments and replace them, irrespective of vacancies, if you really want to Indianise the Army very quick. Now I am glad to hear this morning that a principle like this, namely, to replace, irrespective of vacancies occurring, some British officers by Indian officers, has been accepted and that 8 units will be replaced by this process of entirely withdrawing British officers and putting in Indians in their place. Sir, grateful as I am for these small mercies, even so I think that the process will be a very slow one indeed, taking into consideration the fact that you have to replace sooner or later no less than 3,200 officers. Now, having shown that the percentage of passes and people admitted into Sandhurst College is very small and therefore the intake would be very small, I would now like to deal with the second question, namely, whether the regulations which are framed by Government with reference to admission to the Dehra Dun College are likely to satisfy the requirements of the country. Because, the Dehra Dun College is after all a College for preliminary training for the ultimate training to be given to Indians at Sandhurst. Now, I fully recognise, Sir, that the education for a military career ought to be very sound; it ought not only to look to educational attainments of the candidate; a man destined for a military career must have character, an instinct for leadership and other qualities as well, and, if possible, must be trained in the environment of Sandhurst where he can rub shoulders with his British comrades. But, taking all these facts into consideration, there still remains the question whether the present rules are in the circumstances of India fair enough to attract a large number of people. Now, looking into these regulations, I find that the age of the boys who will be admitted under the regulations in the first year class in Dehra Dun College is 12 to 13. Boys over 13 are not to be admitted. Now, I consider, Sir, that, considering the habits and customs of the people of this country, this is rather too tender an age for Government to lay down. I recognise that the military career, if it is to be successful, ought to be begun at a very early age. But to imitate the public school regulations in England and to transplant them here and to lay down that boys in so vast a country as India should be admitted to a place like Dehra Dun at the tender age of 12 or 13 years is I think a very hard condition. Now, I want to say a word about the allotments in the admissions. The total number of people to be admitted into the Dehra Dun College is at present about 40 and eventually, finances permitting, Government hope that it may be raised to 50. I want the House to realise whether the present number 40 is adequate for the needs of the country. If we have to Indianise the Army very quick, the total minimum number of 10 laid down or even 50 for next year or the year after that is, I believe, a very small number to fix, if at all we are to go on with the process of Indianisation fairly quick. Now, even with this number of 40, which is the utmost number allotted for admission at the Dehra Dun College, we have to remember the sources over which this number of 40 is distributed. The sources are three. These 40 students to be admitted into the Dehra Dun College are distributed firstly between the different provinces of British India, (2) the Indian States, and (3) the sons of Indian officers of good service in the Indian Army. Now, my point is that, if 40 is to be distributed over these three sources, the number that will eventually be allotted for the sons of the middle classes or the other classes in the different provinces of British India, the share that will go to them will be very small indeed and, therefore, in order that the 9 different provinces in British India should get an opportunity to send a larger number of boys for a military career, I think the number to be admitted into the Dehra Dun College and to be eventually sent up to Sandhurst ought to be increased, whether the finances at the present moment strictly allow it or not; for the simple reason that we are spending on the military side of our Budget no less than 62 crores of rupees and I think it is but just and fair that, if the country is spending so vast an amount, the Military Department ought to spend for the training of cadets much more than the Dehra Dun College is doing at present.

To sum up, then, Sir, in the first place, I want to know whether Government have arrived at any decision whether Indians will be admitted and trained for the Air Force, I want to know, secondly, whether the Artillery will be thrown open to the Indians. Thirdly, whether the 8 units in which or course Government are now prepared to replace Indians, whether that bears a reasonable proportion to the total number of officers, 3,200, if that figure of mine is correct, and fourthly, whether the regulations for the admission to the Dehra Dun College are sufficiently elastic as to give the fullest opportunity in the different provinces to Indian boys who are to be educated for a military career.

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney (Nominated: Anglo-Indians): Sir, the subject-matter of the Resolution that we are discussing to-day 12 Noon. very closely concerns the future of the community which I have the honour to represent in this House, for as permanent residents of this country and statutory natives of India, or, as I would prefer to call ourselves "Indian citizens" we claim and rightly claim a participation in the Indianization of all the Services in general and the Indianization of the Army in particular. I say Army in particular because from the very inception of my community, it has played an important and unique part in the defence of this country for which, I regret to say, it has received very scant recognition until quite recently when His Excellency Lord Rawlinson was good enough to recognise it publicly. Sir, I submit, that the claims of my community are all the more necessary for I take it that I am right in prognosing that, when the British Army quits this country,—which I hope it never will— at that time will take place the disappearance of the Auxiliary Force, of which force my community, I am proud to say, forms about 3rds. Should this happen, what Military Service and employment, I ask, would be left for the Members of the Domiciled Community. It is because I apprehend the effect on my community so far as the Military defence and employment in this country is concerned that I make this pointed reference to it and to make my point quite clear, I wish to draw the attention of this House as also the Government to the Select Committee that sat on the Esher Report two years ago and whose report was, in the main, accepted by this Honourable House. I was mainly responsible for the framing of Resolution No. 15 which Resolution runs as follows:

"This Assembly recommends to the Governor General in Council that 'Anglo-Indians' should be included in the term 'Indian subjects' or 'Indians' whenever such terms occur in the above Resolution."

That Resolution, Sir, was unanimously adopted by this Honourable House and I here again thank the Indian Members of that Committee for acceding to my request. I was therefore rather surprised and disappointed, when listening to my Honourable friend, Mr. Yamin Khan, to find no mention whatever in the Resolution of the Anglo-Indian and Domiciled European community. Its inclusion, Sir, may be implied. (An Honourable Member: "The word 'Indian' covers it.") That may be, Sir, but the wording of the Resolution and the way he remarked on it leads me to infer—if I am wrong, the Mover can correct me when he replies—that this recruitment was entirely for Indians. Well, Sir, when Resolution No. 15 was accepted by this House, my community seemed at ease as regards its future military safeguards, but I regret to say that events have not proved this to be the case. Let us see what the Government has done in the way of giving practical effect to that Resolution since its passing. The prospectus of the Prince of Wales Dehra Dun Military College was published, I do not think there is even mention of the words "Anglo-Indian" or "Domiciled European" in it.

Mr. W. M. Hussanally (Sind: Muhammadan Rural): Don't you come under the term "Indian"?

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: After repeated inquiries from the Military Authorities I was told that as it involved a question of policy, the matter had to be deferred and referred to higher authorities, and to-day, i.e., two years after this Honourable House unanimously accepted Resolution No. 15 I am told that I cannot get admission into the Dehra Dun College, that the doors of Sandhurst are open to my community for admission into the Army, and that if I require admission into the Dehra Dun College, I must now give the Government some further guarantee that Resolution No. 15 is accepted by the whole of my community in India, and to satisfy this curiosity of the Government, I am now collecting information, but I can assure the Government that as far as I have been able to ascertain, my community prefers to enter the Indian Army via the Dehra Dun Military College. I can assure the Government just now that the community realises that as the Army becomes more and more Indianised, the need for Sandhurst will pari passu with that development decrease and it will be closed so far as the Indian Army officers are concerned. Therefore, it is only a fool who will expect to enter the Indian Army through Sandhurst when the Army is completely Indianized. I therefore say on behalf of my community that as far as I have been able to ascertain, we would like to enter the Army via the Dehra Dun College. But, Sir, I have something further to say regarding the position of my community, which to-day is not only an extraordinary one but which to me is unintelligible. Let me explain my point. When the domiciled community are employed in the defence of this country, be it internal or external, they are called "European British subjects," but when so employed, and an occasion arises, we are denied in many cases the jury privileges given to Europeans, when not so employed, they are called "Statutory natives of India," vide article 37 of the Civil Service Regulations. Sir, what I now want to know from the Government, so far as this Resolution is concerned, is what are they pleased to call the domiciled community—"European British subjects" or "Statutory natives of India"? If the former, then according to the terms of this Resolution my community is distinctly debarred from participating; if the latter, then I would like to know from Government what policy is it that actuates the Government of India in debarring my community from entering the King's Commission Banks of the Indian Army via the Dehra Dun Military College, and at the same time I would like to remind the Government that Resolution No. 15 which was accepted by this House gives my community the same privileges as every one else in India. It is therefore for the future guidance of my community that I ask the Government now and here to tell me what is the status of my community so far as Indianisation of the Army and other Services is concerned. How can we be "European British Subjects" when employed on Military Defence and "Statutory Natives of India" when employed in the Civil Services of India? It is obvious we cannot be both Statutory natives of India and European British subjects at one and the same time. It seems to me that the Government cannot make up their minds, and in consequence (so far as the revolutionary change which is taking place in India is concerned, and in which my community must take a part) we as a community are neither flesh, fowl nor Red Sea herring. It is therefore only natural, Sir, that until I receive some positive assurance from the Government of India as also this Honourable House, I must view this far-reaching Resolution with some degree of apprehension in more ways than one.

especially after hearing what His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief said on the 24th instant and the momentous pronouncement he has just made. I wish, however, that His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief's reply on the 24th instant had been more of the decided "Yes" or "No" order, instead of only advice—sound advice no doubt—but which, unfortunately, I am sorry to say, this House does not always seem in a mood to accept. Let me now more closely examine the Resolution that we have before us. But before doing so, I wish to make it perfectly clear that I take a second place to no one in this House in its desire to obtain Self-Government within the British Empire nor do I ignore the fact that Indianization of the Services including the Army is a "sine qua non" to this goal. This claim is only the natural sequel and as a citizen of this Empire I desire to wholeheartedly associate myself with this aspiration. But where I find myself at variance with the Mover of this Resolution is whether it is necessary for the Indian Army to be Indianized at the same speed at which the other services are to-day being Indianized. This is the question which agitates my mind and compels me to issue a note of warning so far as the Indian Army is concerned. Is it the proper time—Is it safe to Indianize the Indian Army at the speed which the Mover of this Resolution demands? I take it, Sir, that this Resolution is the outcome of Mr. Jannadas's Resolution moved last year on the Indianization of the services. (Some Honourable Member: "No, no.") If it is not, Sir, then the word "Indianization" as viewed by my Indian friends is possessed of two interpretations one by Mr. Jannadas Dwarkadas and one by the Mover of this Resolution, Mr. Yamin Khan. My Honourable friend, Mr. Jannadas Dwarkadas, when he moved his Resolution regarding Indianization of the services, distinctly laid it down that this meant participation, in the entrance to every Service, by everyone in India. That would include those who were permanently domiciled in this country. I now realise that Mr. Jannadas said about two weeks ago that it includes any one so long as recruitment is in this country.

Mr. Jannadas Dwarkadas (Bombay City: Non-Muhammadian Urban): On our terms.

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: On the terms of pay or whatever it be, and recruitment being in this country, the field should include all communities in this country. (A Voice: "Certainly.") I see my Honourable friend, Mr. Yamin Khan's Resolution does not as far as I can see bear a similar interpretation of the word "Indianization" because the wording of it is such that it implies that no one else but Indians will come within the scope of his Resolution. I hope I am wrong in my interpretation. If I am wrong I shall be very glad to be corrected. But, Sir, however much I am in agreement with the Indianizations of the Services, it is in the acceleration of speed that I see the first danger signal of this Resolution. I will ask this House to remember that it was barely two years ago since the Select Committee report on the Fisher Committee Report was brought before this House and it made a modest proposal of 25 per cent. of King's Commissions to Indians. That was accepted, and here we have His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief to-day, our expert adviser, telling us what the Government of India has done, what the Government of India is doing, and what the Government of India will do. He has told us very clearly that there are 371 Honorary King's Commissioned Officers, 60 Indians holding full King's Commission in the Indian Army, 23 Indians under training at Sandhurst and 38 Indians in the Dehra Dun College, and to-day he has made the announcement which has evidently not satisfied the House, that eight separate and complete Indian units will be officered entirely by Indians. This gives you a total of about 500 Indians who are to-day or will in a very short time be holding King's Commissions and after these eight units are officered by Indians the total will be over 600 giving a rough proportion of one Indian to fourteen British officers. Does not this satisfy the House for the present? His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief told us that there are certain peculiar qualities that a British officer or any officer requires before he can take up command in any army or in any regiment, especially in the Indian Army. He also advised us to learn to walk before we attempted to run. I wish he had told us to learn to crawl. He has also explained to the House how violent and sudden would be the change and how strained would be the efficiency of the Indian army if we carried the scheme into effect at the speed advocated by this Resolution. He pointed out that India is still in a disturbed condition and that there are signs of danger both outside and inside, and he told us that the time is not opportune for so sudden and drastic a change. He told us also that the Government of India is desirous of satisfying the aspirations of this country, and, to-day he has given us the news that eight units are to be officered entirely by Indians and Indians alone. And here we are, in the face of all this, sitting down here in comfortable chairs—as far as we are individually concerned we are “babes” considering our ignorance of the Army—sitting down here and discussing and trying to make an army within 10 or 25 years, imagining that an Army like a mushroom is the product of a night or even a period of 10 or 25 years. No, Sir! Much as I am an advocate of Indianization of the Services and of Self-Government yet I am not an advocate of (what I consider this Resolution if passed would create) wrecking the Indian Army, an army that has taken England over 100 years to build up and an army which to-day even is not perfect. I submit with all respect that it is not the Indian army officer or Sepoy who is asking for this change. It is the Indian politician who demands this extraordinary speed of Indianization of the Army,—the Indian politician who in his race for Swarnj has evidently become dybopic and myopic regarding the defence and safety of his own country. Sir, it is not my desire to deery or belittle the ability and the courage of the Indian officer for he has proved his worth in the battlefields of the world, but let me ask the Honourable Mover of this Resolution, has he asked the Indian officer what he thinks of this Resolution? Would he welcome it? Would Jack Sepoy welcome it? No, Sir, the bon camaraderie and good feeling between the British officer and his men in the Indian Army is the secret of its success, the cementing influence which, if taken away, I think will within a short time sow the seeds of disintegration. It will surely be necessary for the Honourable Mover of this Resolution to take into consideration how he is to obtain officers for the King's Commissions. It will certainly be by open competition. You cannot on that occasion exclude any class. You will there have the learned communities of India, if I may say, the Pandits of India topping the list and securing appointments as officers in the Indian Army,—I see my Honourable friend, Mr. Rangachariar as a Member of the learned Braumin Community appreciates this fact. You will have army officers recruited from classes who unfortunately have not got martial traditions and martial instincts while the rank and file will be recruited mainly from the martial races in India. Can you visualise an army, if we go at the rate that we are asked to do, say of Sikhs commanded by a scribe from Bengal,—he may be an excellent civilian officer, but he may not be any good as a commanding officer in the Army,—of an army of Gurkhas commanded by a Bania who would make a most excellent man at the stock exchange, but would not be much good in an army. It is this, Sir, that makes me think that the speed of this Resolution is much too great. It is not practical, at least not just now for India. That Nirvana which my friend, Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas, so spectacularly talks of is not of our life time or within the visual perimeter of the present century, and till that Nirvana is reached, we should be satisfied with taking over what His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief has given us, and let us go slowly especially so far as the Indian Army is concerned. If this Resolution were carried I predict that within 25 years there will not be one united Indian army as we have to-day but different Territorial armies, such as the Sikh Army with its own Sikh officers, the Gurkha Army with its own officers, the Rajput army with its own officers and so on. I am certainly in favour of allowing more Indians into the King's commissioned ranks of the Indian Army, but it is with regard to the speed that I wish to draw a line. I therefore oppose this Resolution and of all the amendments I am more inclined to favour Dr. Gour's because it asks for a progressive Indianisation compatible with efficiency and the retention of the British officer who, as is well known, is the only man to whom every caste and creed of Sepoy in the Indian Army will willingly go for advice and help knowing that such advice and such help will not be subordinated by the unfortunate prejudices of any caste or creed, which we now find. Sir, it may be of interest to Members to know what our friend, the late Law Member, Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru, has to say on Indianisation of the army. In an interview which he accorded to the "Times of India," in its issue of 18th January, he said:

[Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney.]

"To my mind the question of the Indianisation of the commissioned ranks of the Army is even more important than any question of immediate constitutional advance. Without an efficient Indian Army officered by our own nationals self-Government for India must be a very unreal and shadowy thing. It is for this reason that I have always laid the greatest possible stress upon the subject of the Indianisation of the Army being tackled by the Government of India seriously. I realise that we cannot Indianise the Army as quickly as some people could wish. At the same time it cannot be postponed indefinitely or for a very long time. If I were a non-official Member of the Assembly I would concentrate all efforts in bringing pressure to bear upon the Government to bring into existence a proper machinery for the training of Indian officers in this country, and if it involved any heavy expenditure I would willingly submit to it."

These are the sentiments to which I would subscribe and that is the point of view from which I approach this Resolution. I oppose it but I am inclined to support Dr. Gour's amendment as it stand. I think this Honourable House will be well advised if it takes His Excellency Lord Rawlinson's advice and went slowly, in order that it may learn to walk before it attempts to run.

Sardar Gulamjilani Bijli Khan (Bombay Central Division: Muhammadan Rural): Sir, I rise to make a few observations on the motion before the House.

Sir, I submit that any proposition likely to bring about an innovation of such a serious nature without making an experiment will not appeal to this House. The safety of a country depends upon a powerful Army which is well equipped, and well organized, and further it is an established fact that no Government can satisfactorily carry out its functions unless it possesses a strong Army.

[Sardar Gulamjilani Bijli Khan.]

With regard to other Departments of a Government, inefficiency is not such a great factor, compared with the Military Department, considering that the destiny of a nation depends upon the efficiency of that department.

His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief has already assured the House of his sympathy with all reasonable aspirations of this country and the statement made this morning is proof of that sympathy. With regard to the subject matter of this Resolution His Excellency has satisfactorily explained that a beginning has already been made and high hopes are entertained by him regarding the future of the college at Dehra Dun and the present and future admission of cadets to Sandhurst. I submit, Sir, that it is the duty of all interested in this subject, to be grateful to His Excellency for this beginning, however small it may appear, because I feel confident that the ideal aimed at in the Resolution before this House will be gradually realised, consistently with efficiency, which is highly desirable, as the destiny of India and the realization of her aspirations depends upon internal as well as external order which necessitates an up-to-date army.

It might be suggested that an institution similar to Sandhurst be established in India for the convenience of Indian cadets.

That, I submit, is a matter of detail, since we are assured that the doors of the King's Commission are not closed to eligible Indians and it may be safely left to His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief who has, I venture to say, the fullest confidence of this House. In conclusion I cannot associate myself with the Mover of this Resolution and confess that I am fully convinced by the observations so ably addressed to this House by His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief.

Further, Sir, if this Resolution were given effect to, the result would be that after about 22 years the doors of the Indian Army would be closed to British officers, who have, it is universally acknowledged, built up the Indian Army and brought it to the present state of efficiency. I submit, Sir, that this is a wrong principle. To ensure a high standard of Indian officer, it is essential that the criterion of recruitment to the Indian Army would be similar to that of the other services.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar (Madras City: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Sir, the remarks made by the two previous speakers call for some reply. In the first place I must hasten to express the thanks of the whole of the Indian community for the first step which has been taken to-day in the announcement given to us this morning by His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief. In all these matters, as we were told by the Honourable Mr. Innes, it is the first step which counts. When once the first step is taken, I am sure that public opinion will assert itself and those Indian officers who are going to be put in charge of these eight units will give such an excellent account of themselves in their work that at no distant date, probably within my own lifetime I will see all the Indian units officered by Indian officers. Man is the creature who exhibits himself according to the environments in which he is brought up. When I heard the last speaker, a true Indian, bemoan the fate which may happen 22 or 25 years hence when the Indian units will be officered by Indian officers I recalled to my mind the truth of the saying that we are all so brought up in such surroundings that we cannot look beyond them. We cannot soar as high as we ought to do and therefore it is not in anger I listened to his speech. It is more in sympathy and pity that I listened to the remarks which fell from my distinguished friend. Sir, it requires some imagination and some patriotic sentiment in us to rise above ourselves and our surroundings. I may assure my Honourable friend that it will not be an evil day at all either for India or for England if the Indian Army is officered entirely by Indian officers. On the other hand the Empire will be the better for it. As for my friend, Colonel Gidney, he was blowing hot and cold. I listened very respectfully and attentively to all that he said. Is he an advocate of the Resolution? Is he advocating the Indianisation of the Army or is he not? Or is he only for Anglo-Indianising the Army? It appeared to me the latter is the truth. He asked what about the attitude of the Indian community towards his community. He put that question to the Government and not to the Indian community. So long as he looks to the Government for help, so long as he looks only in that direction, he can guess the answer of the people of India. Let him feel like an Indian. Let him yearn like an Indian. Let him share the aspirations of Indians. Then he need have no fear as to what his place will be in the Swaraj that is bound to come. So long as he does not look to India, so long as he does not look to the place of his birth, so long as he does not look to his own people among whom he lives, so long as he does not ask them what their attitude is going to be, what answer can we give? Well, the truth is out. Let him ask the question 'Am I an Indian or am I an European?' Well, he must answer it himself. It depends upon his community. Sir, we had a most distinguished Anglo-Indian in our province, Mr. White of revered memory. He never bothered himself about this question. He considered himself an Indian first before he considered himself anything else. If your community is composed of Whites, I mean in that sense, if your community would not consider themselves whites, in the other sense, then you need have no fear as to the treatment you will receive at the hands of your fellow countrymen. Remember that you are a fellow countryman of ourselves. Work with us, fight with us, for all the rights, for all the privileges, which a citizen in His Majesty's Empire should enjoy. Fight for equal rights, don't fight for difference of pay, difference of treatment, don't ask for pay as a European and claim privileges as an Indian. Don't claim recruitment as an Indian and ask for European pay. Then, there is no difficulty as to what the attitude of your neighbours will be to your community. Don't look down upon the sepoy, be a fellow sepoy with him. Don't look at his colour, and wherever you go, consider yourself an Indian first. Be a neighbour to your fellow-Indians, then there will be no difficulty, and no anxiety need be felt as to your position.

Mr. President: The Honourable Member must now bring his remarks into order. He may assume, for the purposes of this debate that 'Indian' includes 'Anglo-Indian.'

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: It does, but it is more because of the remarks which fell from my Honourable and gallant friend. Sir, I have said enough. As a Member of that Committee which sat on the Esher Committee's Report, I was at one with him in including in the term 'Indian' the term 'Anglo-Indian' also. Therefore, we do not want to go back upon the understanding which we came to. Sir, what we mean by 'Indianizing the army' is 'Indianizing by the people of India.' Sir, as regards the merits of the Resolution, I quite recognize that it is not proper to hasten the speed in a case like this. As I have stated, I am quite content, speaking for myself—I do not know what my friends think—I am quite content, with the first step which has been taken. But I hope the next forward steps will not be delayed. I hope more speed will be put on, that we will be running hereafter,—I do not mean the people here will be running, but I mean, so far as Indianization goes, I hope the Government of India will not merely walk but will run in this process of Indianization. Sir, I support the Resolution and the amendment.

Khan Bahadur Abdur Rahim Khan (North-West Frontier Province: Nominated Non-Official): Sir, I have been listening with great interest to the speeches delivered by the different Honourable gentlemen. I have much pleasure in supporting my Honourable friend, Mr. Yamin Khan's Resolution so far as the spirit is concerned, but I must say that I differ from him on more material points. Sir, I would be false to myself, false to my country, if I did not want that the Indian Army should be Indianised. When there is a unity of allegiance, when there is a unity of discipline, when there is a unity of action, when there is a unity of thought, why should there not be a unity of enjoyment of equal rank,—my contention is backed and supported by the war which has proved that Indians deserve that. Now, Sir, I differ from my Honourable friend when he claims that the Indian Army should be entirely Indianized. Before I reply to him, I would ask him one question, whether this Honourable House has settled once for all that we are going to have Swaraj, or Home Rule, within the British Empire or without the British Empire. If this Honourable House has settled this, that we must have that Swaraj under the British rule, then, Sir, I shall be the last person to say that the Army should be entirely Indianized. I should say that it should be mutually Indianized with the British as well as the Indians. I want them to share with us the simple soldier's grave,—having equally with us one heart, one mind and the same dust. Sir, my Honourable friend, I must say, perhaps thinks that as every thing can be gained in due time why should not this Indianization of the Army be brought about by a sudden impulse? I must draw his attention to this, that let us be in right earnest, and let us be true to ourselves, and let us be true to our country. Suppose we want that this Indian Army should really be Indianized: how long will it take? Sir, where will he get men who are expert in science, where will he get efficient men to-day who can be placed in charge of the different Departments which entirely depend on science? Before Honourable Members blame Government for that, I would appeal to them to consider what is the feeling of His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief. I could tell them one thing, Sir, that, although I am not in close touch with His Excellency, those Indian officers who have been immediately under him, have got the highest possible respect for him, and they say that they have always looked upon and found His Excellency as their father, as their friend as well as their Commander-in-Chief, and everything else in this world. He always takes a great interest in the Indian soldiers, and His Excellency was perfectly right when he made a statement, and I think we should be grateful to Government, and we should appreciate his sense of justice when he made the statement. He did not mean to say that only these 8 Divisions would be Indianized; he simply said this, that for the present these 8 Divisions would be Indianized, and that it was an experiment, and let others come forward, and places will be offered to them. I think we should be satisfied with that. Now, Sir, I will come to some remark which fell from my Honourable friend, Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar,—and, of course, I am not concerned with that because it was a business of the Government to reply to that; but still, as a Member of this Honourable House, I think I will just make some observations on it. I do not think it is desirable, even if the Secretary of State gave permission, that these papers should be laid on the table. We have been already fed up with the Royal Commission business, and I ask, are you going to have another Royal Commission? I think, Sir, that as the Civilian has got his grievances, so if we push on and if we do not exercise our discretion and get another Royal Commission, we will have to face discontent among the British military officers too. I think the one is enough to embarrass us; it will be bad indeed to be saddled with two. Now I would advise my friend, Mr. Yamin Khan, to consider the problem whether he would be true to India, true to the interests of India, if he presses for the whole army being Indianized by Indian officers at this time, when you see all around different sorts of movements, when you see different sorts of military development outside India whether it would be safe that the Indian Army should be officered by Indian officers only. I must say that the Honourable Member is like a girl who is always impatient to have her chaperone removed; and I think it is in the interests of the girl that her chaperone should be round about her; so this British military officer having played the part of her chaperone, her guardian, I think it would be ungrateful on our part if we should be in such a bad temper as to wish to get rid of the chaperone. Let India grow, let India first look after herself, that will be the proper course, and that will be the sound policy.

Now, Sir, I will say one thing more. I think it was the last time when His Excellency said if I am not mistaken, these were his words, that he could not see how the British soldier should be commanded by an Indian officer. I must say, Sir, that I must strongly protest against that. When we have to look to the true interests of the Empire we must be above these things. I think an Indian officer, if he can be an ideal soldier, he can also in due course be an ideal officer. I hope His Excellency will not stick to his words, and if the Indian officer becomes an ideal officer, he won't mind if British regiments are commanded or officered by the Indian officer. I can say that during this big war,—I do not want to mention personal names, but I know for certain that some Indians had the fortune to command British regiments, and they have justified their selection or nomination by those officers who had given them the command. So I must appeal to the Government as well as to the Members of this Honourable House, let us approach this question in a true spirit and mutual respect and mutual grace. I would advise Government that Government should be rather generous and must be liberal in extending this concession which must come in due course. Government must act in a spirit of true statesmanship. A true statesman is one who realizes his opportunity and takes advantage of it. There must be a policy of give and take on both sides.

I would say one word also to my friend, Mr. Rangachariar. Sitting as I am by his side, my Honourable and gallant friend, Colonel Gidney, said that he particularly wanted to plead the cause of his community only. He simply wished to ascertain from Government what the position and status of his community in this connection would be from the Government point of view. My Honourable and gallant friend said openly that he would prefer to call himself an Indian citizen if he had to call himself anything at all.

Finally, Sir, I would request my Honourable friend, Mr. Yamin Khan, not to go so far as to demand complete Indianization. I am certainly in complete accord with the spirit of his Resolution but I do not sympathise with the impatience which he feels and the entire Indianization of army without the British element, which he pleads.

Mr. K. Muppli Nayar (West Coast and Nilgiris: Non-Muhammadian Rural): Sir, I belong to a class which has been termed reactionary and I shall not mind if I am once again called one for now placing my views before the Honourable Members—a duty I feel I am bound to do. The Resolution deals with a subject closely allied to further reforms, Indianization in general and Swaraj. The importance of ultimate Indianization of the army will be fully admitted by everyone who believes in Swaraj for India. We cannot have Swaraj, give little or no voice to non-Indians in the choice of action in this country and yet at the same time expect them to execute our commands and shoulder the responsibility. If Swaraj ever comes, I believe we will have to find the men to enforce the commands of the central authority in India, whether they be of a civil or military nature. However, there can be little doubt that we make a great mistake when we wish to force the pace. To treat the Indianization of the army as merely a matter resulting from the passing of a few examinations or from a few years' soldiering will be a great mistake. It is no use trying to count too much on our past. It is no use quoting the Mahabharata and Ramayana to show that we led armies and fought battles. The point is, have we got the necessary conditions and the materials that are wanted or at least are we likely to have them in the near future? I do not know what my Honourable friend Mr. Rangachariar's surroundings are, but I must positively say, "no." Then what is the use of tying the hands of the Government as regards the method of recruitment or by serving them with a notice to do it all in ten, twenty or so many years. Without the cohesive force, I mean the British element, what is the Indian army as a whole worth? Is the Punjabi willing to be or capable of being led by a Madras, a Gurkha by a Mahratta or a Madras by either? What about the Hindus and the Muhammadans? Are we going to have communal representation in the army also, or is it our desire to turn the Indian army into so many loose packs of mere aggressiveness? We must all learn to have something more in common before anything like what is demanded can be safely aimed at, achieved or fully and rightly enjoyed. In an important question of this sort we cannot afford to shut our eyes to hard facts or to make vital experiments. I should therefore entreat patience of my friends and ask them to leave the matter to the British Government who seem to have some idea of Swaraj for India and who have promised it. Keep reminding them of it by all means, but do not kill the goose that lays the golden eggs.

Finally, I thank His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief for the sympathy he has shown in his speech this morning and I suggest that His Excellency's proposals should be gratefully accepted.

Maulvi Abul Kasem (Dacca Division: Muhammadan Rural): Sir, when I came to this House little did I think that I would have an occasion to speak; but the discussion which has taken place makes me feel that I will be shirking my duty and my responsibility if I only give my silent vote. In the first place, Sir, although I do not commit myself exactly to the wording of the Resolution as drafted by my friend I must say that generally that Resolution expresses correctly the opinion of my countrymen at any rate, if not the opinion of this House. It has been asked by one of the speakers, "Why pin down the Government to a particular course of action?" The Resolutions passed by this House are at best only recommendations, and in making our recommendations we have to express ourselves in terms which represent the feelings of my countrymen. It has been remarked, Sir, that we must learn to walk before we can proceed to run, and that the pace at which we are moving is rather fast. Sir, I beg to submit that in the matter of military acquirement, if we have ceased to walk and if we are still crawling after 150 or 200 years of British rule, it is not our fault but our misfortune, and the mistake I think lies at the door of our administrators. Sir, I do not wish to go into the ancient days, if I might so call the mythical days of the Mahabharata and Ramayana. I will come on to more solid ground and draw the attention of this House and of the Government to more recent history and to more solid facts. I think the British Government can be fairly said to be the successors of the Moghul Empire, and I might remind the House that the Moghul Empire was never so strong and consolidated as when it entrusted its army and its administration to the people of this country. Trust begets trust. I, Sir, share the opinion and the feelings of my learned and distinguished friend, Mr. Rangachariar, in the expression of our gratitude to His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief for his anxiety to Indianize the Indian army and for the sympathy he has shown. But, Sir, we are here discussing not the personalities of the members of the Government but the policy of that Government. I am afraid, Sir, that the halting hesitating policy that has been adopted by this Government and the nervousness shown by them in all matters of concessions and reforms has neither been wise nor equitable, while in some cases it has proved to be dangerous. Somebody remarked sometime back that half measures, political and social, or even in a matter like whisky, are always useless. You must have a full measure. Therefore, Sir, I would appeal to the Government to make the pace at which they move a little more rapid and to take us by the hand and help us to walk and to run. Sir, in this connection I might say that it depends upon our teachers, our mentors, our administrators whether we crawl or walk or run. They can do as they like. If they wish us to run we will be able to run in the course of a very few years. But if they desire that we should crawl we shall crawl till the day of judgment. Sir, I am reminded of the story of the step-mother in Bengal who used to carry the child of her husband's first wife in her arms. She declared that she had so much affection for the child that she must always carry it about in her arms. But the people knew better. They said that she carried it continuously in order that it may not be able to walk and run and develop its faculties. I do not mean to say, Sir, that either the Government of India or the military authorities here follow that policy of the step-mother. But I appeal to them to always follow a policy which will not give the people of this country cause for apprehension or suspicion.

Sir, I find from the agenda paper that a crop of amendments have been tabled on this Resolution. Some of those amendments ask for communal representation and territorial distribution of these officers. I say it is too early to discuss those details. First let us get the principle admitted. Let us secure for Indians what Indians want. Then it will be time to set our domestic differences at rest and not before that.

Sir, a word about my gallant friend, Colonel Gidney, before I sit down. The question of the Anglo-Indians in this country, either for military service or for civil service, is a problem which will have to be tackled both by the Government and by the people of this country. But I can assure my friend over there that the only people who can solve this are the Anglo-Indians themselves. If they want to live and flourish in this country, they must become Indians first. They must not only, as my friend, Mr. Rangachariar said, have the same aspirations, the same ideals and the same imagination, but I think they must work and they must live like Indians. They are a people who are recognized at the present moment by none and I hope it is for them to choose one side or the other, and therefore the future will depend on the side they choose. If they make a mistake, they will have to repent for it later on. Sir, there has been an amendment moved that the correspondence between the Secretary of State and the Government of India should be laid on the table of the House. I do not know how far that correspondence is private and confidential, but this much I must say that if this House—and by this House I mean naturally the people of this country—is taken a little more into the confidence of the Government, it will be to the advantage of the Government itself than otherwise. Sir, it has been said that if we want to get Swaraj, we must prepare by Indianizing the officers of the Army. I say that whether we get Swaraj or not, whether we get responsible Government or not, whether the Government is an autocratic Government or a bureaucratic Government, it is essential that many of the officers of the Army in India should be Indianized, because you have found out by experience that there has been great heart-burning among the people of this country and among the subordinate officials because the high offices of the Government were not thrown open to my countrymen and the Government have recognized that and now the highest offices in the State are open to natives of this country and I think they have acquitted themselves fairly well and creditably both from the people's point of view and the Government point of view. If there was discontent in the civil service over this, there is naturally discontent in an aggravated form in the Army if the Indian Army finds that the places of officers are not open to them. Discontent in the Army is more undesirable and might lead to disaster, and, therefore, it will be an act of statesmanship, of diplomacy and of, I think, foresight, if the Government takes upon itself the responsibility of Indianizing the officers of the Army and of training us for those offices. The people of this country can never believe that we have not got the materials for making up good officers of Army, because, even recently we have had an Indian Army led by Indian Generals and Martials. Therefore, Sir, I think that this Resolution which has been moved expresses the voice of the country, and, as such, it should receive that respect, consideration and attention which it deserves. With these words, Sir, I support the spirit of the Resolution as moved by my friend, Mr. Yamin Khan.

Mr. T. E. Moir (Madras: Nominated Official): Sir, I must confess to

1 P.M. having listened with some disappointment to the debate which has taken place on my Honourable friend, Mr. Yamin Khan's Resolution in view of the announcement which has been made by His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief. With the exception of one or two speakers, it seems to me that few who have taken part in the debate have shown due appreciation of the very momentous character of the announcement which His Excellency made to the House, and I could have wished a greater appreciation of its importance had been shown in the course of the discussion. For myself, I listened to that announcement with feelings partly of relief, partly of regret and partly of apprehension: of relief because it seemed to me that the announcement was in part a declaration to the people of my own country that there was some hope that in future the very heavy burden of responsibility which they have to carry has some chance of being lifted; that that responsibility under which my country is at present labouring is, so far as this country is concerned, in part at least, and as I personally hope in as brief a period as is possible, going to be transferred to this Assembly and to the representatives of India in this Assembly. I listened to the announcement with regret because there is no doubt that it implies that, possibly before very long, that long comradeship in arms between my countrymen and the Indian Army will be brought to a close. Now there has certainly, as far as I know in the course of history, been no comradeship in arms between two races which has lasted so long, and I doubt if future history will ever be able to bear witness to a comradeship which has been more glorious and more perfect. But I also listened to the announcement with apprehension. There is no doubt that to-day we have crossed the Rubicon and that we are at last really face to face with the great issue which underlies this whole question of constitutional reforms in India. It is whether India will be able to recruit and maintain an army which will be capable of defending its frontiers, and also of rendering that loyal obedience to the constitution without which the constitution cannot hope to continue or to be preserved. That is the issue which the announcement made this morning brings prominently before us. Now, Sir, during my leisure hours, since I came up to Delhi, I have been looking into the history of Delhi and of those parts of India with which hitherto I have been insufficiently acquainted. And what do I read? Of invasion after invasion, which has swept across the frontier, uprooted principalities and powers and shifted the whole balance of power in India. And on no single occasion hitherto has India been able to repel those invasions. The question is whether the new Army, that reconstituted Army, with reference to which this morning we have taken the first step, will be able to perform a task which, as far as I can discover from the annals of this country, no Indian Army hitherto has been able to accomplish. (Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: "But India has lived.") Is the wheel again to come full circle? I sincerely hope not. I can only hope that history will not repeat itself and that what I may call the somewhat facile optimism which seemed to me to characterise the speeches of some of the Members of this House will be justified. But, Sir, I have also in the course of my readings been much impressed by one further fact, and that is, that those constant defeats, to which I have referred, were due not to any lack of gallantry, not to any defect in martial qualities of the armies who went forth to defend the frontiers of India—the ballads of the countryside still recall the gallant deeds of their forefathers—not to any such defects was that failure due but to the fact that it was impossible apparently for them to act under one leader, to accept a common discipline and to look to one central authority. And that is a further issue which the announcement made by His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief this morning has raised, the great constitutional issue,—will this Assembly in the future be able to control an army, such as the Indian Army must be, constituted out of such a variety of tribes and castes and races? Will it be able to control and render it amenable and an efficient executant of its orders and wishes? Sir, surely in view of these questions which I have asked, we might pay more attention to the spirit, to the underlying meaning of His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief's announcement. Surely, on an occasion such as this, it is out of place to raise the question perpetually raised in this House, to tilt at the authority of the Secretary of State, to demand that papers be laid on the table of the House. Surely this is not the occasion to debate a question of percentages, or display our mutual fears and jealousies. God knows that question is serious enough in this connection but surely on this occasion we might allow communal bickerings and disagreements to be silenced for once. We have, as I said, passed the Rubicon. We are at the turning of the ways; and I should have thought that on this occasion we would have confined our attention to-day to the important, the momentous nature of His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief's announcement, and allowed ourselves time to consider, to reflect on what it means. I would, Sir, press upon my Honourable friend, Mr. Yamin Khan, to withdraw this Resolution. Further opportunities will surely arise for debating all minor points and for discussing or settling our differences. I would, therefore, ask my Honourable friend to withdraw his Resolution and the House to adopt towards the announcement made by His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief an attitude which I would urge upon them will be consonant with the dignity of the House and with the nature of the occasion.

Rai D. O. Barua Bahadur (Assam Valley : Non-Muhammadan): Sir, after having waited nearly two years since the passing of the Resolution on the Esher Commission's Report which the Government accepted by promising to appoint Indians to the extent of 25 per cent. of the commissioned ranks of the Indian Army, we have learnt with a sense of relief from His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief to-day that eight units of Infantry will at once be officered by Indians. I think, Sir, this is a move in the right direction and it is but the beginning of the move. I am not a believer in the principle which obtains in some quarters that the change can be effected at a moment's notice. I for one am not prepared to accuse the Government with anything like apathetic feelings towards the problem, for I find they have taken steps to train Indians in military schools and colleges in the meantime. I understand that many more units will be thrown open to Indians in the near future and my countrymen should not be impatient. At the same time I would humbly advise the Government to expedite the matter. After the momentous announcement of His Excellency this morning we should be satisfied that the promise made by the Government is not quite hollow, and as they have redeemed their promise in part we can safely take it for granted that they will not take long to redeem it in full. At this juncture it will be the proper duty of Indians to show that the appointment is justified. If justification can be established, the task of Government will be easier, and the burden of military expenditure on the tax-payer will be lightened. As, however, effect is being given to the subject of this Resolution, I think it need not be pressed and it may be safely withdrawn with thanks to the Government.

Mr. P. P. Giwala (Burma : Non-European): Sir, the Honourable Member from Madras, (Mr. Moir) who spoke a little while ago from that corner has charged us with not showing due appreciation of the announcement that was made by His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief this morning. I may, however, remind the Honourable Member from Madras that according to the conventions of political life as they are understood on this side of the House it is not always necessary to go into raptures over every announcement that is made. We are conscious of the fact, and I am prepared to admit it and I believe Honourable Members on this side of the House who agree with me in my opinion will endorse that view—that a very momentous announcement no doubt has been made by His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief to-day. This step which has been taken, I venture to state, is a step which ought to have been taken long ago, but we are grateful that the step has been taken eventually and that a Government which we have often described as incorrigible has shown itself capable of improvement in course of time. The Honourable Member from Madras also stated whether, if the policy enunciated by His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief was pursued to its logical conclusion, a time will arrive when India will be able to face aggression from without, and he drew a parallel from the past. It is needless to point out that historical parallels are often untrue, because the circumstances change, while those who draw the parallels do not appear to recognise the change of circumstances. If it was a fact that the Indian army of the future was to be absolutely on the lines of the past—like it was in the days of the Ramayana and the Mahabharata and even of more recent pre-British times,—it may reasonably be argued that the Indian Army of the future may not be equal to the occasion if foreign danger really took the form which it is anticipated by some men on the analogy of the past it would take. But we have been in contact with the British Army for 150 years; we have learnt some of that art or so much of it as has been accessible to us under our peculiar conditions. We have fought along with them; we have built up our own traditions which are entirely different from the traditions of those days in which an Indian Army was not able to face outside aggression. We are prepared yet to learn from the British officer and we have not said that the British officer is to leave this country bag and baggage to-morrow. He will be with us still, and we hope that he will always be with us in some form or other. To say, therefore, that if the Indian Army is Indianised the history of the past will be repeated is to commit an anachronism which has been exploded times out of number in human experience.

There are one or two expressions in the speech of His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief which he made on the 24th January, to which with great respect I would take exception. He said, when giving the reasons for not expediting the pace of reform in the army: "I need hardly remind the House that ever since the end of the Great War India has never wholly been free from some form of external or internal menace." Now, I would like to ask His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief—can he say of any country at the present moment, leave alone India, which has been free from these two dangers? Can he point to any country and say that in any particular decade it was always free from those two things? Can it be said of any country in Europe just now that these dangers do not exist? It is no good, Sir, talking of these dangers; they are permanent dangers as far as human society is constituted and they have to be borne in mind in whatever direction you wish to proceed. Then, with regard to the "internal menace," I do not wish to enter into a discussion on the principle involved in those two words. But I protest against that expression being used in connection with the maintenance of the Indian Army. It is no function, I maintain, of the Army to preserve internal peace and this House will not recognise that principle. The Indian Army cannot be maintained on the principle of maintaining internal defence, unless you are prepared to admit that the basis of the Government of this country is your Army. If that is not your position, then I maintain, Sir, that the sooner the doctrine of preserving internal peace and order by the military forces of the Crown is abandoned the better.

There was another remark made by His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief and it was this, that it was essential, if the Army was to be efficient, that the Indian officer should have the same training and the same education as the British officer. Baldly stated, that proposition is a sound one, no doubt, but what has been our experience in the past in applying this doctrine to other branches of education? Did not we adopt the doctrine in the latter half of the last century, that whatever was good for the British youth was good for the Indian youth in matters of general education, and have we not been trying from the beginning of this century to correct some of the errors which we perpetrated in consequence of the adoption of that doctrine? If you are going to start your new career of Indianising the Army upon that doctrine, I venture to submit that the time will come when you must revise that policy of yours as you are having to do to-day in matters of other branches of education. And, before we start on any very large scale upon this career, in my opinion an examination is necessary as to whether we are going to apply to the Indian officer exactly the same standards of education as are applied to the British officer. I will now turn for a moment to what the Honourable Member for Commerce and Industries had to say on behalf of the Government with reference to its relations with the Secretary of State. As he got up to speak, Sir, he reminded me of a picture of Prometheus Vincetus which I had seen some years ago where Prometheus was chained to the rocks by the thunder of a cruel Jove and while he was doing his best to break his chains he could not do so. I may, however, tell the Honourable Member for Commerce and Industries and his Government that they can snap those chains if they try. If they submit to what they are allowed to receive from the Secretary of State, those chains will never be broken. But, if they insist upon their own rights and if they take this Assembly into their confidence and ask for our support to break those chains, those chains will be broken. If they persist in accepting orders the reasonableness of which they are not satisfied with, if they do not tell us that they have done their best to get other orders and that, unaided by this House, they have not succeeded, it is their own fault. And my advice to them is that, though we differ upon other points, we are in entire agreement with them if they make up their mind to conspire with us and seize every opportunity to remove the shackles which they and we find so tiresome and oppressive. I have no hesitation in saying that in that conspiracy—it will be a very pious conspiracy—they will have every encouragement which it is in the power of this House to give them for when they are free, we shall consider ourselves free. Freedom in this direction must come to us and to them together and if they attach any importance to it, I urge upon them, Sir, to come to this House and join forces with it, to fight and vanquish in the end our common enemy—the Secretary of State for India.

Mr. President: I desire to point out to the House that, while there are still a certain number of amendments on the paper, I cannot call on the Honourable Members in whose names they stand until we have disposed of Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar's amendment. To give them their fair chance I propose to put that amendment now.

The original question was that:

"This Assembly recommends to His Excellency the Governor General in Council to be pleased to get King's Commission for Indians by direct recruitment and by promotion from the rank of Viceroy's Commissioned Officers in such number that all vacancies in the Indian Regiments be in future filled by such Indian Officers only till all Indian Regiments are wholly Indianised."

Since which an amendment has been moved :

" To add to the Resolution the following :

' This Assembly further recommends to the Governor General in Council that he may be pleased to lay on the table of the House the scheme, if any, for the Indianisation of the Indian Army and the correspondence, if any, that has passed between the Government of India and the Secretary of State for India on the subject '."

The question I have to put is that those words be there added.

The Assembly re-assembled after Lunch at Half Past Two of the Clock. Mr. President was in the Chair.

Colonel Sir Sydney Crookshank (Public Works Department Secretary): Sir, it seems to me, if I have the indulgence of the House to say so, that this debate has so far proceeded on what I would term somewhat ragged lines, and the amendments which I see tabled to this Resolution also indicate that the question which we have before us is very likely to become further involved. Now, Sir, there is considerable weight in the valuable remarks which fell from my Honourable friend from Madras. At the same time I think many Members of this Honourable Assembly will probably agree with me in considering that we do not want to approach this question from the melodramatic side. Proceeding to the remarks which have fallen from my Honourable friend from Burma, I can only say I regret I cannot subscribe to those remarks in so far as they apply to the education of Indians to take their place in the ranks of the Indian Army. However, that may be a matter of opinion, but I base my opinion largely on the fact that circumstances from the military point of view have changed very extensively of late, and that the enemies we have on the Frontier are now well trained and organized, and very well armed, and they are no longer just ordinary hordes of invaders. I would also note that it seems to me that he also transgressed what I might call the first canon of military propriety in not respecting that discipline which is expected from all ranks of the Army, a discipline of exact obedience to constituted authority which requires them to carry out the orders which are in force whether they agree with them or whether they do not.

Sir, this question of training Indians for service as officers in the Indian Army is one which depends very largely on social and economic and also climatic conditions. When I refer to climatic conditions what I mean is that the climatic conditions of India, down in the plains during the hot weather months, are not such as to retain the vitality of the ordinary individual after, say, the age of about 35 to the standard which is required of him in military service; and the advantage which the British officer has in this respect is that he takes leave to European climatic conditions and returns in vigour, and possibly thereby retains his physical youth longer than would his brother officer who happens to be an Indian, who stays in India without having those advantages. However, I will not dwell on that particular point. The House will no doubt agree with me that the points I have mentioned have a considerable bearing on the question we have to deal with.

Sir, I venture to speak on this subject because it may be that I am the only member of this Honourable Assembly who has been on service on the Frontier and in France with British units and with Indian units and under fire with them as comrades in arms. I have been with British units and Indian units in action, in advancing, in holding a position, and also in falling back from one, but I am not going to dwell on that fact in order to analyse the qualities of British officers and Indian officers. Both have their merits and probably also in certain respects their demerits, but I have only mentioned the fact in order to put it to the House that I speak from a practical point of view; I do not merely theorise; and as such, it seems to me that the pronouncement which His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief gave to this House this morning should have given an assurance to this Assembly that the Government proposed to set about the problem of the Indianisation of the Indian Army in regular ordered steps and to base its further Indianisation in the course of time entirely on the results so attained. His Excellency has announced that 8 units will be officered by Indian officers. Well, that itself goes a very great distance. On that basis, he, in his highly responsible position as the military adviser of the Government of India and responsible military expert before this Assembly, would be in a position to judge what further stages of Indianisation of units could be effected and when. I therefore think, Sir, that this House, instead of proceeding to go into the details of all the amendments which now stand tabled on the agenda, which may confuse the issue before us, would perhaps do well to consider the advance which has already been made, and to let these further stages of the development of the Indianisation of the Indian units of the Army be considered in due course, from time to time, according to the results which are seen from this measure of Indianisation of 8 units to make a start with. With that to go on, it seems to me that the field is perfectly clear, and it may be left to the military authorities to advise the Government of India as to what further can be done. I do not think I need detain this House any more in this matter, because we have here an accomplished fact that 8 units are going to be Indianised, and also that an Indian Military College for the training of Indian cadets for the officering of the Army has been established at Dehra Dun. The progress will be watched, and no doubt the House will be advised from time to time. In the meanwhile, it will, perhaps, suffice to abide by the assurance, which His Excellency has given us, and in the future, when the opportunity arises, to consider what are the further stages of Indianisation that the circumstances may permit of.

Dr. H. S. Gour (Nagpur Division: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, in moving my amendment, I should like to make a few formal changes. The House has no doubt received with feelings of gratitude the announcement made this morning by His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief promising the immediate Indianisation of 8 units of the Indian Army. That, I submit, is a distinct step in advance, and for which this House should tender its gratitude and thanks to His Majesty's Government. I wish therefore, Sir, to prelude my amendment with the following words:

"That, while gratefully acknowledging the announcement made for the Indianisation of 8 Indian units, this Assembly recommends to His Excellency the Governor General in Council to be so pleased as to formulate a scheme for the steady increase of Indians in the commissioned ranks of the army with a view to ensure the officering of all Indian regiments by Indian Officers with a minimum of British Officers as may at present be necessary to ensure their efficiency."

Mr. W. M. Hussanally: Sir, I suggest the addition of the words "within a reasonable time".

Dr. H. S. Gour: That is implied. It is more than implied, it is clear. Now, Sir, Honourable Members have referred to the report of the Esher Committee and a subsidiary committee that sat to consider that report. My friend was a member of that committee; so was I. We formulated a series of Resolutions amongst which there was a very important Resolution, Resolution No. 7, which recommended to His Majesty's Government:

"That the King-Emperor's Indian subjects should be freely admitted to all arms of His Majesty's military, naval and air forces, and in regard to ancillary services of the military forces that every encouragement should be given to Indians, including the educated middle classes, subject to the prescribed standards of fitness, to enter the commissioned ranks of the army, and that in nominating candidates for the entrance examination unofficial Indians should be associated with the nominating authority and that not less than 25 per cent. of the King's Commissions granted every year should be given to His Majesty's Indian subjects to start with."

Two years have since elapsed and we have been pressing upon the Government the desirability of taking a practical step in the direction of Indianizing the military forces of this country. Only the other day when my Honourable friend the Mover of this Resolution spoke on the subject, His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief in his speech did not anticipate the immediate possibility of Indianizing any unit of the Indian Army. His speech was a speech of caution; his speech was a speech in which I am perfectly certain His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief has infused his confidence in the Indian Army with the necessary caution born of a practised British Commander. This morning the situation has completely changed and I am afraid very few of us have realized the great change which that announcement foreshadows. It is the very suddenness of the announcement that has taken this House by surprise. But at the same time, Sir, if the House realises that 8 units of the Indian Army are to be immediately Indianized and on the result of that experiment further progress would be dependent, I am afraid this House will say that that is a contingency which it cannot accept. And so far as this House is concerned, it should ask the Government of formulate a policy for the steady Indianization of the Indian Army, subject only to one condition, namely, that the minimum of British officers as may at present be necessary be laid down to continue to ensure its efficiency. I submit, Sir, the only difference between my amendment and the announcement made by His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief and the explanation given by the Honourable and gallant Colonel Sir Sydney Crookshank is that, while they are prepared to Indianize 8 units, they are not prepared to formulate a scheme or to promise further Indianization in the steady manner which I suggest. That is the only difference

3 P.M. between their pronouncement and our demand; and, I submit, Sir, so far as this part of the House is concerned, it is unanimous in its desire that a policy should be enunciated and a scheme formulated for the steady Indianization of the Indian Army. That will not only satisfy the growing rational aspirations of the people of this country but will be an incentive to the very Indian officers who are to be employed in the first eight units. They will feel that they are not the first and the last to Indianize the Indian units and that upon the success, further steady progress has been promised and will be made; and this, I submit, would be for the greater efficiency of the Indian Army and the contentment of the people of this country.

Now, Sir, I turn for a moment to my friend, Mr. Yamin Khan's Resolution and I shall give my reasons why I am not prepared to endorse it. My friend says:

"This Assembly recommends to His Excellency the Governor General in Council to be pleased to get King's Commission for Indians by direct recruitment and by promotion from the rank of Viceroy's Commissioned Officers in such manner that all vacancies in the Indian Regiments be in future filled by such Indian Officers only till all Indian Regiments are wholly Indianised."

Now, Sir, as patriots and politicians, this Resolution commends itself to us. But as men of practical commonsense, as men who have to face hard facts, I am afraid we are not in a position to say that all future vacancies in the Indian Army be filled by the employment of Indian Officers. Honourable Members need not be reminded that the first duty—indeed the only duty—for which the Indian, or indeed any Army, is kept is its efficiency. The object of the Army is to secure peace. The object of the Army is to ward off foreign aggression. How can that be ensured if we were to Indianise the Indian Army per saltum? Up to now there is no doubt that the Commissions that have been given to the Indian Army have justified themselves, fulfilled the hopes that the Military Officers and Commanders felt in them and in their efficiency. But how can we ask the Government that all future entrants to the commissioned ranks of the Indian Army shall be Indians regardless of other considerations. That is a proposition which I fear I am not in a position to subscribe to, and I do not think my friends on this side of the House are prepared to subscribe to that sweeping doctrine. I therefore suggest, Sir, that we should deal with this question as practical men. We should not forget the primary, and as I have said the only, object of maintaining an army, and that purpose can only be served if we gradually but steadily advance in the direction of Indianisation. Some of my friends have asked for the recognition of communal rights. Amongst them I class my friend the Honourable Colonel Gidney. May I point out to him that he and members of all communities will have their place in the Indian Army subject only to one condition, that its efficiency is not impaired. The Army, Sir, is not a representative institution; it is kept for a definite purpose, and that purpose, I submit, cannot be lost sight of in recruiting people merely because they belong to certain communities and not because they possess the necessary grit, strength, stamina, power of endurance and valour for which, I submit, the Indian Army, as indeed all national armies, exist. But as I have said before, Sir, these are questions of detail which need not detain us. We are at present concerned here with the initiation of a good principle. That principle has been conceded by His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief, and all that we can do now is to thank His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief for his announcement and ask him to accept my amendment in which I want that a scheme for the steady growth of the Indian element in the Indian Army be formulated. With these words, Sir, I move my amendment.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"Substitute the following for the Resolution:

'While gratefully acknowledging the announcement made for the Indianization of the Indian units, this Assembly recommends to the Governor General in Council that he may be pleased to formulate a scheme for the steady increase of Indians in the commissioned ranks of the Army with a view to ensure the officering of all Indian regiments by Indian officers with the minimum of British officers as may at present be necessary to ensure their efficiency.'

Mr. E. Burdon (Army Secretary): Sir, the essential purpose of the debate initiated by my friend, Mr. Yamin Khan's Resolution was, if I may be permitted to say so, very well put in the words used by my Honourable friend, Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary. Speaking on the 24th of January in this House, he said, "We are anxious to place before the Government and before the public some substantive and substantial form in which we make our demand for Indianization." This is the real and the central object of the discussion while the Resolution itself and the amendments on the paper represent different conceptions of what that substantive and substantial form can be, or it might be said attempts to define the claim which this House should now combine in making. Well,

[Mr. E. Burdon.]

Sir, it must be clear to the House that of these conceptions that which has been framed by my Honourable friend, Dr. Gour, must commend itself most to the Government. It obviously approximates most nearly to the course of action in regard to the Indianization of the Army which the Government, for the reasons which have been stated very fully by His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief, consider to be wise, and consider to be in the best interests of India. It therefore appears, I am afraid, a little ungracious if I have to say that Government cannot accept even Dr. Gour's proposal. I think the reason—and it is very largely a formal reason—is one which will appeal to this House. The amendment, apart from the initial words which have been added to-day, was framed in circumstances which, as my Honourable friend has said, have been entirely changed. The situation in which this debate commenced has been altered wholly by the announcement which His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief has made to-day. Indianization of the Indian Army was asked for and Indianisation in some measure has been conceded. Now, in the face of this accomplished fact, it seems to me that the amendment must necessarily fall to the ground. It is, at any rate, impossible for Government to accept the amendment, although what has transpired in the course of the debate shows that the real desire of the House is in harmony more or less with the intentions of Government as now declared. But even so, I feel sure that the House would not expect Government to accept a proposal even of the kind which has been made by my Honourable friend, Dr. Gour, immediately after the Government have announced their decision to adopt a particular programme of Indianisation. To do so would be incongruous and would only render Government liable to misinterpretation. It would be believed that Government intend to take some further step at once, either in advance of, or varying from, the measure which has been adopted, but which has yet to be put into operation and has yet to prove its success.

There is only one other point—I propose to confine myself strictly to the amendment—to which I should like to draw attention; it is another point in which the intentions of Government square very largely with the desire which is inherent in my Honourable friend's proposal. His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief, speaking this morning, said:

“There is one other point which it is necessary for me to explain. It is that simultaneously with the Indianisation of these selected eight units, Indians who qualify for the King's Commission will continue, as at present, to be posted to other units of the Indian Army.”

where, of course, they will, for the time being, serve side by side with the British officers who remain. The point of this fact, to which His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief drew special attention, is that the scheme of Indianisation which has been announced to-day contains in itself the germ of growth, that is to say, there is inherent in it the possibility of increase, because the Indian officers with the King's Commission who join other units of the Indian Army, apart from those which are being specifically Indianised, will be available if and when a further stage is decided upon as a result of success having been achieved in the first stage.

Sir, I hope that my Honourable friend, Dr. Gour, and the rest of the House will appreciate the position of Government in this matter. It is, as I say, largely based on the formal reason that, having announced one scheme, they cannot ten minutes later appear to commit themselves to something else.

Colonel Sir Henry Stanyon (United Provinces: European): Sir, it is with some hesitation that I rise to speak on a subject to deal with which I feel myself very imperfectly equipped. I give way to no one in my desire for the advance of India towards responsible self-government in every branch. India is the land of my birth, and it is the land in which most of my life has been spent; and those conditions produce an attachment to the country which must necessarily guide my opinion with regard to its future. I have a good deal of sympathy for the moderate wording of this amendment or proposal put forward by my friend, Dr. Gour, but I seek to deal with the subject in that detached and open-minded way towards which a certain amount of judicial experience helps me. I think I need hardly assure this House that there is not one scrap of racial prejudice animating the remarks which I am now making. I speak from the point of view of the citizen of India whose interest in the Indian Army lies in having at hand a force which protects him from external aggression and from internal disorder; and the main force which guides my opinion on this point is a desire for efficiency and nothing else that is worth mentioning. An Army is a fighting machine. Dr. Gour has rightly described it as something quite different from a representative body, a political body, a civil or administrative body. It is a machine kept for a particular purpose, and its first requisite is efficiency. Sir, if I were convinced that the Indian Army, wholly officered and led by Indians only, would be more efficient than the Indian Army as constituted to-day, I should vote that to-morrow the whole of the 3,000 odd European officers should be sent away and that Indians should replace them. But I am not to be convinced by optimism or by hopes or even by that great regard and admiration which I have for Indians—sincere, honest, hopeful regard and admiration. We have at present an Indian Army that has justified itself on a hundred fields of honour and glory, and proved absolutely to the conviction of every mind that is not overborne by prejudice that the Indian non-commissioned ranks led by Europeans are as good a fighting machine as can be found in the world. But India is advancing, and I have the greatest sympathy for, and regard as most natural the desire of Indians generally to be allowed to try their hand in this field of leading their own men. Speaking for myself I have every reason to believe that if the right kind of Indians are put in as officers they will lead those men with the same success that their European predecessors and comrades and compatriots have done. But, Sir, when we want to substitute a new machine for an old and well tried machine which is still working effectively, we want something like an experimental test before making the change. By the proposal now before the House Government is asked to formulate a scheme. My understanding is that the Government have formulated a scheme. They have started the process of training Indians to possess those remarkable characteristics, those peculiar characteristics, with which alone they can succeed as officers in Indian regiments. They have introduced by the grant of King's Commissions Indians into regiments where, side by side with British officers, they can learn those habits of life and thought and leadership which are essential to success. And now we have this greatest part of that scheme of gradual Indianisation, namely, an actual trial of no less than 8 regiments under completely Indian control. Sir, let the House think what this means. To begin with you have to find 8 Colonels, 8 Seconds-in-Command and 8 Adjutants. I do not profess to know very much about regimental organisation, though I have had the privilege to command Volunteers for 15 years; but I do know this much that upon the character of the Commandant, and upon—what shall

[Colonel Sir Henry Stanyon.]

I call it?—the tact and adaptability of the Adjutant, a great deal of regimental administrative success must depend. The European officer in an Indian regiment has a much easier position than an Indian officer will have. The difference will be understood by European officers if they will try and imagine what their position would be; suppose in the four double companies constituting a regiment one company—or even half a company—consisted of European Christians. They are at present in a detached position, able to act with complete impartiality among all the different people who go to constitute an Indian regimental unit. The Indian officers' position will be very much more difficult for reasons upon which I need not enlarge, but which, I am sure, will be obvious to every Member of this House. We have two amendments proposed on this paper to-day which themselves point to these difficulties. These are all difficulties that we have to consider. Dr. Gour's proposal is: "Don't wait and see what is the result of the experiment. Let that go on as best it may, but, despite that, without opening your eyes by the experience gained in connection with these 8 units, formulate a scheme—formulate a scheme." I submit that this Resolution is premature for that reason, and that this House must possess its soul in patience. It has achieved a tremendous amount of success in pushing forward this matter—success which perhaps a very short time ago even the most sanguine of the Members of the House would scarcely have hoped to realise. Now let us wait. If these 8 units prove, as I have every hope myself they will prove, to maintain their efficiency under Indian command at the same level which they have attained under European command, then our position will be a very strong one, and we may be able to ask that, in place of 8, we should have 80 units of that kind.

Khan Bahadur Zahiruddin Ahmed (Dacca Division: Muhammadan Rural): Sir, before I move my amendments, and before I go on to speak on the merit or demerit of this Resolution, I respectfully ask the Honourable Non-Official Members of this House, in whose hands the Honourable Mover is, to ask him to withdraw this Resolution. I will give my reasons for this novel request. The reply given to the Resolution by His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief, Lord Rawlinson, is very sympathetic and very very hopeful and I am certain that His Excellency will give us as much indulgence as possible, as he has already commenced to help us, compatible with the efficiency of the army, for the furtherance of the desires of our rising hopes. By forcing this Resolution on His Excellency we will simply convert a friend into a foe, as in the interest of the Army he cannot but oppose it. I say we should know better. I must frankly confess that the Resolution as worded cannot be accepted as it is. When I first read in the Resolution that all vacancies (I lay stress on the word "all") in the Indian regiments in future be filled by the Indian officers, etc., I thought my Honourable young friend wanted to be amusing and humorous. A certain Persian saying which I reproduce here came to my mind at once:

"Gorhai misikin gur pur dustai tumkh kunjusk aj jahan bur dustai"

"Had the innocent cat got wings, there would have been no sparrow left on the face of the earth."

But, when I found that His Excellency, a grim soldier and a far-sighted statesman—two very distinct qualities very seldom found in one man—has taken it seriously, I immediately changed my views and came to the conclusion that I was not right.

If this rash and embarrassing Resolution is accepted by this Honourable House as it is (I lay stress on the words "as it is"), it will simply alarm those from whom we expect more help, more reforms and more good. It will meet the same fate as the immediate Swaraj Resolution of Simla. No Military Board worth its name can accept such a drastic change and that too within 24 hours. Hence, when we are certain of failure, why should we do it? We are a responsible body and not a schoolboys' association, why should we do a thing which will damage our cause?

"Agar akeli ek eshara bus ast".

"If you have any sense in you, one nod, one sign, is enough."

Such an impudent Resolution is sure to be rejected by the authorities at Home as they cannot accept a thing which will be so detrimental to the efficiency of the Army and hence to the interests of the country as a whole, and then some of my Honourable friends will commence to whimper and whine that such a well cut, well dried, well groomed and well lobbied motion failed to act. I say it is better to remove the face before the slap has fallen on it. If we get slapped none but we, the Honourable ourselves, shall have to be thanked for it. No use to be wise after the event. No use to advance the face to be slapped. "Chera Kare Kunad Akel ke baz arad pushemani" Why should a wise man do a thing which will bring remorse afterwards? I admit we wanted a long sword but we have been given a pen knife. If we make well use of this pen knife, a better and a longer one will follow. It looks to me that we have commenced to use the knife at the throat of the giver thereby creating our own obstacles in our own way. What we did before is already known, now we are demanding to drive away all the British officers in the Indian Regiments immediately. A creeping conviction is coming on me that we are here voicing the feelings of the outside non-co-operators and the extremists. It looks to me as if the outside, the Honourable non-co-operators, and the inside the Honourable non-officials are one and the same or at least they are "Nisbati Brothers", brothers by contracted relationship which, when translated in common Hindustani means "Salas" and "Buhnois."

Sir, we have heard from His Excellency that in the list of the Viceroy's Commissioned Officers there are no fit persons to be given immediately King's Commission. Such officers are not in existence but shall have to be given birth to. My young friends may be up and doing but till then will all the vacancies remain unfilled up? In the meantime they can be filled up by the young non-official Members of this Honourable House. I am giving this piece of advice to His Excellency.

I asked the opinion of one of my constituents who had some military experience in Mesopotamia and he replied as follows: "Kare bojina nist rajjari" meaning surgery is not the business of the monkey. If any of my Honourable friends will argue that the surgeon is simply to hand over his knife to the monkey and the monkey will at once turn out to be a good expert surgeon, I must say that the argument is very forceful and to that I have no reply. There is a vast difference between civil and military matters. A civil officer may commit a mistake which can be easily rectified by his superior without much harm being done. Such is not the case with the military officer. A mistake made by a military officer in the battle-field may end in a great catastrophe, may end even in losing a battle. It has been known in history that the loss of a battle ended the existence of

[Khan Bahadur Zahiruddin Ahmed.]

Empires. This nation is in its infancy and I am not prepared to experiment with its life and death by this unworkable, absurd Resolution.

I say there is no magical force in adopting a Resolution. If my Honourable friends the non-officials do believe that a magical virtue is imparted to a Resolution by its acceptance by this Honourable House, I may point out with hundred and one apologies, that such magic will not appeal to the British nation, the British public, the British rate-payers and the British Parliaments. Then what will appeal to them? I submit, it is logic or logical force. Has my Honourable friend the Mover any logic to his side? If he has, I failed to see any. If any of my Honourable friends here will tell me if he has found any, I shall then be delighted.

In the first part of his speech he spoke volumes in praise about the present British officers. He fully admits that they are doing their duties admirably well. He agrees also that they never failed on any occasion. People want a change when the existing order of things is not working well. The Mover admits that the present system is working excellently well. Still he wants a change. He says the change may be equally suitable. But where is the proof?

" Seeing an eagle soar on the high,

The Baby in the cradle wishes to fly "

Such a baby which is still in the care of wet nurses. That the eagle can fly I can see and I must have proof that the baby will be able to fly equally well before I will hoist up the baby high in the air. A few of my Honourable friends told me if I were to support this Resolution I will get the " Bah ", " Bah " of the revolutionary irreconcilables of my country, my countrymen of that class will say excellent, excellent. Revolution in political matters is very risky. The roads of politics are full of zig-zags, full of ups and downs like hilly roads. No sane man should ride on such roads at break neck speed. The riders will not only break the necks of their horses but will break their own necks in the bargain. I say the revolution in the Army is still more risky, nay, dangerous and I am not prepared to support such a drastic innovation simply to win the applause of the outside extremists and non-co-operators. I have a conscience which I cannot sacrifice. I ask the Honourable non-official friends in this House to let us be true patriots, let us not discard genuine gold for an alloy, though the outside of it may be shining. One must not pretend to know a thing of which one knows nothing. Pretended knowledge is very, very dangerous. I ask again and again from the Honourable non-officials what is their military knowledge. I will answer the question for them. It is not even superficial but abysmal ignorance. My Honourable friends are very confident that they can drive the carriage of the administration of the Army very ably. But, with all humility, I may enquire whether they know that the horse which is to drag the carriage is to be harnessed in the front or behind it. What I believe would happen is, if any Government or any Military Board forces any such Resolution on any Commander-in-Chief, the officer will resign rather than agree to experiment or work on it. A soldier cannot or will not discard his sharp sword for a doubtful one. No statesman will agree to stake the existence of an Empire for an experiment.

My Honourable young friend expresses a pious hope that the newcomers will turn out to be as good as old experienced officers whom he wants to replace. He does not instance a single regiment where it was tried and found successful; on the contrary, he says that a similar thing was tried in Company Bahadur's time and it brought about the Mutiny in 1857, which every one deploras. Here my Honourable friend falsifies his own assertion and again he is impudent enough to suggest the same thing which ended in a great catastrophe. I only wish to say, once cheated, twice shy and no more.

I asked a man belonging to the rank and file of the Indian army about these British officers whom my Honourable young friend wants to hang. The Indian soldier replied that these officers are feared by some, liked by others but respected by all and hated by none. I asked him how it will work if they are replaced at once by Indian officers. He said the Indian officers in their place will lean on their remaining British subordinates which will be detrimental to the discipline of the army. He further said discipline in the army is most essential. This want of discipline or the slackening of it under Indian officers brought about the Mutiny in 1857 about which the less said the better. The Indian soldier furthermore said raw levies can be trusted to an experienced officer but a regiment of war veterans cannot be put under the charge of raw officers as in the latter case it will be suicidal. We should try to carry the whole thing to its logical conclusion. I must say in conclusion that my Honourable young friend should now see his way to withdraw the Resolution as it is not only immature but unworkable. To the Resolution as it is I can offer my sympathetic neutrality but not full support. As to my two amendments, after what I have heard from His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief this morning, I do not desire to move them.

(Cries of "Let the question be now put.")

Mr. President: The question is that the question be now put.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: The original Resolution was:

"This Assembly recommends to His Excellency the Governor General in Council to be pleased to get King's Commission for Indians by direct recruitment and by promotion from the rank of Viceroy's Commissioned Officers in such number that all vacancies in the Indian Regiments be in future filled by such Indian Officers only till all Indian Regiments are wholly Indianised."

Since which an amendment has been moved to substitute the following for the Resolution moved:

"That while gratefully acknowledging the announcement made for the Indianisation of 8 Indian units, this Assembly recommends to His Excellency the Governor General in Council to be so pleased as to formulate a scheme for the steady increase of Indians in the commissioned ranks of the Army with a view to ensure the officering of all Indian regiments by Indian officers with the minimum of British officers as may at present be necessary to ensure their efficiency."

The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. S. C. Shahani: Sir, it is with mixed feelings of joy and grief that I come forward to propose my amendment. I would have been very glad if the amendment proposed by Dr. Gour had been carried. It would have been a second step forward. The Government had assented, and in spite of Government assenting, we found this reasonable amendment of Dr. Gour lost. I say that it is with mixed feelings that I contemplate the defeat of the amendment moved by Dr. Gour. If I am sorry, I am also in one sense glad that it has been defeated. It will convince Dr. Gour and men of his class that no moderation will find favour with those who are determined to see that we do not achieve for ourselves the growth to which we are entitled. I should be very sorry to see any amendment proposed which should have a tendency to perpetuate exclusiveness or isolation of either Europeans or Indians. I have enjoyed my contact with the Englishmen, and I think I owe my present development and growth to my contact with them. I am deeply conscious of the good that the contact with the British has done to Indians. On that account I strongly deprecate the exclusiveness of British units in the Indian Army. I have always wished that Indians should be admitted to those units, just as the British are to the Indian. There should be no objection absolutely to Indian officers of the right type and calibre officering the British units. This interchange will tend to serve the ultimate purpose with which Indians and Englishmen have come together. It is not a chance contact so far as I see. I am a believer in divine destiny, and my feeling is that we have come together in order to secure for ourselves and for the countries to which we belong some higher destiny than will be securable singly. But we are fallible men; and we often forget larger consideration for selfish ends. The Britisher would not, I think, consent to be led by an Indian, as indeed was manifest from the speech made by the Commander-in-Chief only this morning. He would not I think hear of the British units being in any manner officered by Indians. Well, in these circumstances isolation is the only course left open to the Indians. If the Indian Army is to be isolated no doubt some of its efficiency will for some time have to be sacrificed. Sir Henry Stanyon was in a measure right when he said that an exclusively Indian Army would not be calculated to prove so efficient as an army, for instance, which is composed of the two races and which has won glory on more than a hundred battlefields. Sir Henry Stanyon, however, seems enamoured of the existing condition of things, where the majority, or rather the whole of the officers of the Indian Army, are British with few exceptions. He seems to contemplate this condition of things with favour and he says, if you change the existing condition of things your efficiency will suffer. That is very much like what His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief said the other day when he eulogized the existing order of things and expressed a regret for the inevitable change that must come upon it. He did say that the change was inevitable, but still he regretted it, and the regret is very much like the regret that has been expressed by Sir Henry Stanyon.

Colonel Sir Henry Stanyon: Sir, may I rise to a point of order? I did not intend to say and to the best of my recollection I did not say that an Indian Army regiment led entirely by Indians would not be as efficient. All I said was that we wanted experience and I expressed the hope that it would be as efficient.

Mr. S. O. Shahani: Well, Sir, I accept the statement, and say that at the present time, according to Sir Henry Stanyon, it is not desirable to go in for any great change in the organization of the officers of the Indian Army; my feeling is that this iniquitous arrangement of having the existing arrangement of having hardly any Indian officers in any Indian regiment should be changed. Britishers should agree, and willingly too, that there should be only a sprinkling of British officers in the Indian Army, and that the bulk of the officers should be Indian.

"The old order changeth yielding place to new,

"And God fulfils himself in many ways,

"Lest one good custom doth corrupt the world".

The existing organisation of the army may have been a very good custom. The British officers leading Indian soldiers have been able to hold their own against foreigners, have been able to ward off foreign aggression, and have won glorious battles. That is perfectly true. But the change in our conditions has made a change in this good custom necessary, we should be fitting ourselves by changing this good custom for even better and higher achievements. I was, therefore, eager that the amendment that was proposed by Dr. Gour should find acceptance; but that has not happened. Isolation or exclusiveness does seem necessary. If so, Sir, I beg to move the amendment which is in my charge, namely:

"This Assembly recommends to the Governor General in Council that effective steps should be taken without further delay towards the Indianisation of the Army in India, and if necessary a committee of experts, Members of the Indian Legislature and other Indian representatives, should be appointed to go into the whole question and to submit a report as early as possible."

I would request the Honourable Members of this House to support this amendment. This amendment is in substance the amendment of Dr. Gour with only this difference that a committee consisting of the Members of the Legislature is recommended. Immediate steps are very desirable. No doubt a momentous step has been announced this morning. Eight units are to be completely Indianised. Important as this step may be in itself, it cannot go very far to satisfy the ambitions of the Indians. Eight units out of 141! You have only to recall what was told us a few days ago by His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief. Preliminary institutions are being designed to feed the Dehra Dun Institute and the Dehra Dun Institute to feed Sandhurst. So far so good. But is this enough? The Indian Infantry consists of Indians and provides for Indian officers to a certain extent. But Indians are admitted to a much lesser extent to the Indian Cavalry. The Royal Artillery, the Royal Engineer services, the Ancillary services, practically the Royal Indian Marine, the Royal Air Force, all these are closed against the Indians, although it is recognised the Indians should learn the art of defending themselves. The sooner they learn the art of protecting themselves, the better will it be for India, and ultimately better for the Empire to which we belong. Very large sums of money—70 crores out of our nett revenue of 90 crores—are being devoted to the Military. Who can endure this expenditure, however well organised the army may be? A citizen army is an essential thing for the country, and the sooner this citizen army is created, the better will it be for India; and the sooner the Indian Army is Indianised in the proper sense of the word the better would it be for all parties concerned, for India and Empire. You will, Sir, be able to understand my view point in its entirety if you will kindly consider what was said only a few days ago in this connection by His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief. He thought that although he was not in a position to reveal the whole scheme that was being formulated for the Indianisation of the army between the Secretary of State and the Government of India, he felt sure that some measures would be devised at a very early date, and one of these measures was announced to-day. He spoke of specific objections, and he spoke of one very great difficulty. What was that great difficulty? It was this that progress in the direction of Indianisation of the Army had one great impediment, viz., the atmosphere of India and the chances of external and internal disturbance. Now, until, he said, an Indian army had been organised as a separate unit and put to the test in a war that was actually waged, or until the Army had engaged in some service on the frontier, no further step could be taken, and not only that, until an assurance, for instance, was given that there would be no internal disturbance and no external disturbance, no further advance could with confidence be predicted. I want to point out that if, under any circumstances India could be secure against both internal and external disturbance, if such a millenium were to come, where would be the necessity of the Commander-in-Chief himself? Under such a millenium we need not have an army and we need not have any commanders; but this is an impossible condition. And if these impossible conditions are being contemplated I would move my amendment and request every Member in the House to give his support to me.

Mr. E. Burdon: Sir, the Government found themselves unable, though with regret, to accept the amendment proposed by my Honourable friend Dr. Gour. The House will readily understand that Government cannot accept the very much less attractive proposition, as my Honourable friend has himself described it, which is in my Honourable friend's charge. Sir, I have already stated the position of Government in regard to this debate and I do not think I need say more than a very few words in regard to the amendment which is now before the House. It would obviously be superfluous in the present circumstances to appoint the committee which it is proposed that the House should recommend, since it is now known to the House that steps are being taken towards the Indianization of the Army and that the measures to be adopted for this purpose have been thoroughly considered by the Government. The policy of Government in regard to the matter has already been decided upon with full knowledge of all the factors bearing upon it and in the light of the most expert advice obtainable. Sir, I oppose the amendment.

The amendment was negatived.

Lala Girdharilal Agarwala (Agra Division: Non-Muhammadian Rural): Sir, I must thank His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief and the Government of India for at last making a definite advance. I must say that the announcement which has been made this morning is encouraging, but it was long overdue. It is rather surprising that, after a tutelage of nearly 200 years, we are able to pick out only eight units to be Indianized out of a total of 141. Whose fault is it, Sir, is it our fault or the fault of our tutor?

Mr. President: I must confine the Honourable Member to the terms of his amendment which asks for communal representation.

Lala Girdharilal Agarwala: I am going to say that Sir. The amendment which stands in my name is as follows:

"That the following be added at the end of the Resolution:

Keeping in view the principle of fair representation of suitable candidates of different castes and communities residing in British India."

Sir, it has been said that the Army is a fighting machine. I admit that it is a fighting machine and I do not want that efficiency should be sacrificed in the least. It is for that reason that in my amendment I have used the words "suitable candidates." I never want nor would I desire that unsuitable candidates should be admitted into the Army simply because they belong to a particular caste or community or to a particular race. Now, Sir, according to my definition, all those persons who reside in India, who have made India their hearth and home, should be eligible. I have said candidates of all castes and communities residing in British India, including, of course, Europeans, Anglo-Indians and Indians, properly so called.

[Lala Girdharilal Agarwala.]

Then, Sir, there are in India several castes which are called the military castes, and there are other persons to whom the doors of the Military Department as also of the Police Department are rather closed. Now, my submission is that suitability and efficiency should be the sole test and not the fact that a particular person belongs to a martial race, that, therefore, he should be given a post as an officer, while a person equally qualified, equally efficient, cannot obtain such a post on account of the fact that he does not belong to the martial races. Now, Sir, if it is not the intention of the Government that there shall be a bar against the appointment of any person as the head of the Army, if there is no such disqualification, simply on account of caste, or creed, or nationality, then I think that it would not be necessary for me to press this amendment of mine. But, so far as I know, there is a bar against the appointment of certain persons belonging to certain castes and communities, simply because they do not happen to belong to what is called the martial races. Now, Sir, I submit that suitable candidates could be found in every caste and community; it depends upon training and not so much upon birth. It is for this reason that I submit that, in case suitable candidates are found in other castes and communities, which are at present not called martial races, they should not be debarred from such appointments. That is the motion which I commend for the acceptance of the House.

Mr. E. Burdon: Sir, the existing system of selection of Indian officers for the Indian Army is as stated in paragraph 5 of the provisional regulations respecting the admission of Indian gentlemen to the Royal Military College at Sandhurst, which reads as follows:

"The general rule in selecting candidates should be that ceteris paribus, selection should be made from the communities which furnish recruits in proportion to the numbers in which they furnish such recruits. regard should also be had to the claim to consideration of candidates from the educated middle classes."

This is our present practice. It is a practice adopted in pursuance of a Resolution of this House, and I think the House will agree that we should abide by it.

Lala Girdharilal Agarwala: I wish to withdraw my amendment on this assurance.

The amendment was, by leave of the Assembly, withdrawn.

Mr. Muhammad Yamin Khan: Sir, I join along with other Members of this House in thanking His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief for making the momentous announcement which he has made to-day. Nobody is more pleased than I am that my motion has accelerated that announcement regarding which the Government of India and the Secretary of State could not make up their minds for a long time past.

But of course I do not want to take up much time of this Honourable House in paying tributes which have already been paid and which I can not pay properly. Before, Sir, I come to the remarks which were made by His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief, on the 24th of last month and this morning, I would like to deal with a few remarks made by different Honourable Members. Some gentlemen have asked me to withdraw my Resolution, and one of them is Khan Bahadur Zabiruddin Ahmed. His patriotic speech, his grey hairs and his calling me a young man with rashness and all kinds of other complimentary words which he used, I need not reply to. He is an experienced gentleman, full of fervour, sense of patriotism and what not. All that of course need not be replied to. He does not want the "Wah-Wah" of the country. I do not know whose "Wah-Wah" he wants. The House will judge, Sir, what his motive is in not wanting the "Wah-Wah's" of the country, in not wanting what the country really desires and keenly feels. That is not for me to judge nor for me to criticise. As far as I can make out, he probably does not know what an Army means. He does not like an Army career, and any of his people might not have been in the Army who would like to better their conditions. But coming of people who have served in the past with great glory in military careers, and being shut off now from such a career, I had to voice their feelings in this Resolution.

There is my other friend Khan Bahadur Abdur Rahim Khan. He has agreed with me and he wanted to support my Resolution, but he at the same time did not agree with me and wanted me to withdraw my Resolution. He says I should not make this sweeping change. I cannot see that in my Resolution I am demanding any sweeping change at all. I will reply to that and I will assure this House that I am very far from wanting any kind of revolution or any drastic change in the military. What I want is only steady and slow progress towards Indianising the ranks of King's commissioned officers and my Resolution means that and nothing more.

Again, my friend, Mr. Bijli Khan, probably under a misapprehension or misunderstanding, interpreted this Resolution in a different sense, and I am sure when he comes to know what I really mean, if he had taken the trouble of reading what I said on the 24th of last month, he would have realised what I really wanted. Some of my friends here seem to be labouring under a misapprehension that I want, by moving this Resolution, to sever the connection of British officers from Indian regiments at once. That is not so. Now, Sir, I do not want to repeat what is reported in the debates of the 24th January. I will take one point in the remarks made by His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief on that day. He said "Do not try to go too fast; do not try to run before you can walk; if you do you will assuredly fall down." I quite agree with this maxim which is very true. I do not want to run; I do not want to go too fast; I do not want that the British officers should be eliminated at once from the Indian Army. What I want and what I said on the 24th January—and here I want to remove misapprehensions in the minds of Honourable Members who might have understood me differently—is that we may learn to stand up. I do not want to run. I want that any vacancy which may fall as a second-lieutenant, that may be given to an Indian. That will not be running too fast, because the Colonel, the Major and the Captain, all British officers, will be there and the Indian who goes as second-lieutenant will only learn to walk—he will not even be walking, he will be learning only to walk—when he is under the control of these British officers and by the time he learns to run it will take him 24 years. I am told, Sir, (A Voice: "Amend the Resolution.") I need not. I am told, Sir, that it takes 9 years for a Lieutenant to become a Captain, 9 years for a Captain to become a Major, and it takes 7 years for a Major to become a Colonel. So it means that it will take 24 years before a Lieutenant who has just entered to-day can become a Colonel of that regiment. It means this: in a regiment which is going to be Indianised it will take 24 years. The experiment which His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief is going to make with these eight regiments will take 24 years, and afterwards he will make up his mind whether the same experiment is to be tried in other regiments or not. If that is going to be done, it will take 24 by 17 years; that time must be taken before we can have the Indian regiments only Indianised. I do not agree with that, Sir. That is too long a time. I want that the Indianisation of the Indian regiments only should be completed, say within a third of a century at least, because I do not want that all the vacancies occurring to-morrow of higher ranks than those of Lieutenants should be filled up by Indians. The wording of my Resolution is different. It says

Khan Bahadur Abdur Rahim Khan: Stick to your Resolution, please.

Mr. Muhammad Yamin Khan: If my friend just waits and tries to put his head towards it probably he will come to know what I mean. I purposely used the word 'and' to which my friend, Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary had moved an amendment to substitute the word 'or'. We cannot fill the vacancies by direct recruitment at once. What I want is that only those officers who are already serving as Viceroy's Commissioned officers, if they are efficient and capable, may be promoted to the rank of King's Commission at once; and by that time, we may be giving a training to young boys who will ultimately start, after two or three years, taking their place in the regiments as Lieutenants. I do not want to stop the promotion of Viceroy's Commissioned officers, if any suitable candidates can be found amongst them. I know that they have rendered great services and it will be a great hardship if any officer, such as a Subadar or Risaldar Major who is found quite efficient to hold the position of a Lieutenant, should be debarred from being promoted. I know that they have a fairly good number among them who can be promoted, and some of them have been chosen in the past. As far as I have learned—and I stand to be corrected by Mr. Burdon—there is a 35 years' age-limit for these Viceroy's Commissioned officers to be promoted to the King's Commission. Anybody who has exceeded the age of 35 years cannot be promoted, though he may be a very efficient and capable person. And by using the word "and"—'and Viceroy's Commissioned officers', I simply took that point of view. I knew that there had been hardship in certain cases and His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief has used all his powers in doing away in certain cases with this age-limit, a course which his strong personality enabled him to do. But, if there happens to be some people of this kind that have exceeded the age-limit of 35 years, they might be promoted to the King's Commission. But ultimately, I do not aim that they should go on doing this. Of course, there must be direct recruitment. What I propose is this that direct recruitment should be the principle, that all future vacancies should be filled by them. Which means that the training will take at least three years for a man. And this process will start after three years, if we start giving them vacancies. If in 1926 we find that there will be 100 vacancies then from to-day I ask the Government to start training 100 boys who might fill those vacancies after three years, i.e., in 1926. I do not say they should take at once a number of inefficient boys—catch hold of them in the street—and give them King's Commissions. I say, get any kind of examination or any criterion of selecting the boys from India out of these 36 crores of people—up to that number which might be wanted after three years, and I do not think that India has not got efficient boys at present who cannot hold those jobs after three years, if they are properly trained.

Then, Sir, many of the Honourable Members have thought fit to refer to the question of efficiency—and remarks that efficiency will be impaired simply because English officers will be removed and English traditions will not be in the Indian regiments. I disagree with them. It is not this. If these boys are trained from the very beginning, if they receive education under European tutors, if they are brought up under their European Captains, and when they become Captains, they are under their Majors, and then under their Colonels and then under their Generals—then I do not see why their training should not be according to the British officers' training. And they will be quite efficient persons. They will be quite good officers and they will know how to lead their armies. There was one other thing; the question of castes and creeds always creeps in. But I don't agree with that. These are difficulties which can be solved later. This matter comes after we have made our schemes mature. Then we can deal with these questions. But we are not going to deal with these questions to-day. Now, as far as I understand, in every regiment, if there are 6 troops, 2 troops are Sikhs, 2 are Jats or Rajputs, or some other martial race, 2 are Pathans. Then these 6 troops are in one regiment and they are led by their own officers. Out of all these officers there is one Risaldar Major selected and he is to lead all of them. Besides these, there are English officers. These difficulties can be solved later on in a very amicable manner. I need not dilate upon these questions which might crop up later on. The only point now is this. Is it the policy of the Government of India to prepare India to be a self-governing country or not? If this principle is accepted by the Government of India, then what is the preparation towards the defending of our shores and our frontiers? There is no other possible way. The statutory period for revising the Reforms Scheme is fixed at 10 years. I want that the Government of India should take some steps to show to the Royal Commission which may sit after 10 years that so much progress has been made towards teaching the Indians in defending their shores or their frontiers. I say if after ten years we have only Captains in the Army, we can put it before the Commission and say, "Look here, all the Indian Regiments have got at least Indian Captains" though the Majors and Colonels may be British officers at that time. If after ten years we have at least Captains their efficiency can be proved by their officers. I am not asking to fly. I am not asking to run. I am not demanding that a man should be appointed Major General or Lieutenant General or take the place of His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief or, as some paper suggested, that the vacancies which may fall vacant in Baluchistan or any other place should be filled by Indians. No, certainly not. I simply want the slow progress of first learning to stand, then learning to walk and then learning to run, and that is the process which I have put down specifically by specific scheme in my Resolution. I have not hinted any sweeping change. I have not demanded anything which can be called rash. Of course, my Honourable friend with his hoary head might be thinking me a rash person. But I never believe in revolution. I have never been a supporter of revolution. I want a steady progress and this is the steady progress which I propose. Then, Sir, in support of this Resolution that Indian Officers can be very good and efficient officers, I put the case of the Hyderabad contingents. I put the Gwalior Armies, I put the Armies of the different Native States who have played a great part in the war in Mesopotamia, in Palestine, in France and in Egypt. The Nizam's Armies went to fight in Palestine and they have rendered great service. They have won a lot of battles. Were they officered by British officers? No. They had Indian Officers, and they have proved their worth. If we can find men in such backward territories as the Indian States, why cannot we find better or equally good and efficient persons in the advanced territory of British India? We can find many people. It has hitherto been the policy to recruit for the Viceroy's Commissioned Officers people quite illiterate because there are no prospects. If there are prospects, if an efficient man comes to know that he can rise up to Major General or Lieutenant General, of course, he will come forward to join the army. There will be any number of young men then who would be quite willing to come, and even more efficient people, even graduates will come forward and I can find any number of them to-morrow to join the army as Lieutenants who will be quite willing to join this career. You do not put before them any temptation; you do not give them any opening and then say that nobody can be found, that they are not efficient persons, we cannot trust them, we have to try them and so on. Of course, all these kinds of excuse may be made. But I have been hearing a lot of heart-burning among the Indian officers who got their commissions in 1905. They were superseded by British officers who were appointed in 1912. Five Indian officers who got their King's Commission in 1905 should be superior, in the natural course of things, to those officers who got their commission in 1912. I know the case and I can recite the names of those to-day who were superseded by British officers appointed in 1912. This was simply because they were Indians. If this is the case, you cannot expect efficient persons to come forward. Efficient persons will come forward only when there is the same opening, the same career open to them, and this is what I claim. I do not want to touch the British Army at all. I wanted an opening for Indian officers where there will be no competition between Europeans and Indians, where there will be no question of racial distinction at all. I simply wanted to touch the Indian army. In order to safeguard the British interests I am not touching the artillery, or the British cavalry, or the British infantry or the British Air Force, nothing of the kind. What I am touching is only the Indian infantry, and the Indian cavalry where I want that Indians should by slow degrees be appointed and that within a third of a century they should be fully Indianised. This is very clear and I am sure that my Honourable friends have misunderstood me—I do not claim to be an expert in drafting, but I have made myself clear as to the intentions which have animated this Resolution of mine. I have only one word to say to my Honourable friend, Colonel Gidney. He has dilated a great deal on the question of his community. I need not enter into that question. So far as I am concerned, I will take the members of his community as Indians if they care to abide by all the disadvantages under which the Indians labour. If they agree to accept that position I shall certainly include them among Indians. But if they claim all the advantages of an European, then, of course, they must come among Europeans. I need not enter into that question, but as he has asked me to declare it publicly I thought I must say these few words.

Mr. President: I must ask the Honourable Member to conclude his remarks now.

Mr. Muhammad Yamin Khan: A friend of mine put a question whether we want Swaraj inside the British Empire or outside the Empire. It is a fact that this Assembly never thought of having Swaraj outside the British Empire. What we are standing for is Swaraj within the British Empire. If we had wanted to remain outside the British Empire, we should have asked even for a portion of officers of the British regiments, but I do not claim that. I do not want Indians should go as officers over the British soldiers, and in the same way I do not want that British officers should go as officers in the Indian regiments. Of course, these two different armies should exist side by side but separately. It is a slur on the Indians that they cannot be efficient. That slur should be removed at once, as Indian officers can lead the army as well as the British officers have done in the past. I have paid a tribute to the British officers on the 24th January and I still pay that tribute for the great services that they have rendered. There is no controversy about that. I was sorry when I heard a martial class man saying that the Indian regiments will not be efficient if they are officered by Indians. I cannot say anything in regard to that and I deplore that statement. I deplore that such people have such poor opinion of the people of this country. There are men in this country who are as efficient as European Officers. As His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief said we want not only combatants, we want staff people. We want technical people. I say that Indians have not shown themselves in any way less deficient in engineering skill. They can be good staff people as well. Where brain is concerned you can find in India quite efficient people. It was only when the question of the combatants come in that it was doubted. But Indians have proved their capacity in the battle-fields of the war. They have shown themselves very efficient even though they do not possess that education which is given to highly educated persons holding the King's Commission. In the war, when the British officers were killed, these illiterate persons had to take the lead. See the records of the war and that will show how efficiently these illiterate Indian officers led the army and won the battlefields. If even illiterate persons proved themselves so efficient, then there is no doubt that a highly trained person will be no less efficient.

Mr. E. Burdon: Sir, the discussion has been long and I am sorry the House will not wish me to make it very much longer. My Honourable friend must be aware from what has already transpired that the Government are unable to accept his Resolution and I think the House appreciates the force of the circumstances which have compelled Government to take this view. Before my part in this debate ends, however, there are a very few observations which with the permission of the House I should like to make. In the first instance, Sir, I think it is clear from recent discussions that the Members of this House and the Government have now come to a much closer mutual understanding in regard to this vital question of Indianisation. The Government have frankly recognised that the demand for Indianisation is a natural and laudable aspiration which the Government are anxious to meet so far as this is compatible with the proper discharge of the grave responsibility that they have for the defence of India. On the other hand Honourable Members of this House have, I think, very frankly recognised the gravity of the issue, the difficulties of the situation and the limitations within which the solution of the problem is to be found. His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief speaking the other day also told the House that while correspondence was proceeding between the Government of India and the Secretary of State on the subject of a concrete scheme of Indianisation, the Government of India had been busily engaged in laying the foundations without which no scheme of Indianisation could hope to be successful. I gather that all those who desire that Indianisation shall be a real success are in whole-hearted agreement with the view which the Government have taken in regard to this matter also. It is recognized, I think, that preliminary education and training according to the standard laid down by Government are essential; and the care and forethought which Government have endeavoured to exercise in laying the foundations have not failed to find appreciation. I think the points to which I have drawn attention very briefly will carry their own significance to the House. I will not labour them, but will merely say that it makes the solution of any problem very much easier when both parties to the discussions come to a fair and frank recognition of the difficulties with which the problem is surrounded and if the problem is attacked fairly on both sides in a practical spirit. Sir, the announcement which His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief made to the House this morning has led in certain quarters to expressions of dissatisfaction. I am glad, however, to be able to say that the feeling does not appear to be universal; on the contrary, I acknowledge that the majority of the House appear to congratulate themselves and to congratulate India upon the very real step forward which has been taken. In the words of my Honourable friend, Mr. Rangachariar, it is the first step that has been taken, but it is the first step that counts. And surely this is the true and just view for the House and for the people of India to take, to regard the scheme, which is now to be introduced, also as adding one more to the many substantial achievements which can be placed to the credit of this the first Legislative Assembly under the reforms, and as representing the capacity which the Assembly has to induce and direct the good will of Government and to make progress towards the ideals of their ambition. I feel sure that at any rate the Indian officers of the Indianised regiments will take this optimistic view; I am sure that they at any rate will say to themselves, not "we want more than we have got," but will say, "here is an opportunity which we will grasp firmly and confidently, and we will endeavour so to shape it as to consolidate a claim to greater things both for ourselves and for those who come after us."

Mr. President: The question is that the following Resolution be adopted:

"This Assembly recommends to His Excellency the Governor General in Council to be pleased to get King's Commissions for Indians by direct recruitment and by promotion from the rank of Viceroy's Commissioned Officers in such number that all vacancies in the Indian Regiments be in future filled by such Indian Officers only till all Indian Regiments are wholly Indianised."

LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.

Monday, 19th February, 1923.

The Assembly met in the Assembly Chamber at Eleven of the Clock.
Mr. President was in the Chair.

MEMBER SWORN :

Mr. George Sampson Clark, M.L.A. (Burma : European).

STATEMENT LAID ON THE TABLE.

Mr. A. H. Ley (Industries Secretary): I beg to lay on the table a statement furnished by the High Commissioner for India in the United Kingdom of cases in which tenders other than the lowest in respect of stores purchased for India have been accepted by him during the half year ending 31st December, 1922.

HIGH COMMISSIONER FOR INDIA, INDIA STORE DEPARTMENT.

ABSTRACT OF CASES in which Tenders, not the lowest complying with the requirements of the Stores Department and of the Indenting Officer, were accepted on the grounds of superior quality, superior trustworthiness of the firm tendering, greater facility of inspection, quicker delivery, etc.

HALF YEAR ENDING 31st DECEMBER 1922.

PART A.—Cases in which lower foreign tenders, including British tenders for foreign made goods, have been set aside wholly or partially in favour of British tenders.

Stores ordered.	Contract Number.	Name of Contractor.	Amount of Contract.	Lowest Tender not accepted.	Reason for acceptance.
Insulations	B. 2606-1602, 10th July 1922.	Jas. Macintyre & Coy. Ltd.	£ 545 10 0	£ 479 10 0 (German Manufacturer).	Better delivery. The difference in cost would be further reduced by extra cost of inspection in Germany.
Wire Insulated	R. 2640-2262, 12th July 1922.	Hackbridge Cable Coy. Ltd.	485 5 0 (Item 7).	450 15 0 (Item 7). (Belgium Manufacturer).	Quicker delivery. The small difference in cost would probably be absorbed by the extra expense of inspection abroad.
Pero-Silicon.	B. 2686-2683, 2nd August 1922.	J. Hinckley & Son	348 15 0 P. O. B. (Llmingham).	341 5 0 (F. O. B. Forgrund, Norway).	Lowest suitable having regard to shipping facilities.
Cable	B. 3163-3153, 16th August 1922. B. 3164 B. 3165 B. 3166	Western Electric Coy. W. T. Hinley's Telegraph Works. Johnson & Phillips, Ltd. Callender's Cable Coy.	3,574 3 8 3,104 12 8 3,318 6 11 3,112 9 4 13,109 12 7	12,949 6 3 (Austrian manufacturer). Extra cost of inspection payable.	The order was shared between the British firms on account of their greater reliability, the conditions prevailing in Austria being uncertain. The additional cost, after allowing for the extra cost of inspection abroad, is inconsiderable.

PART A.—Cases in which lower foreign tenders, including British tenders, have been set aside wholly or partially in favour of British tenders—contd.

Stores ordered.	Contract Number.	Name of Contractor.	Amount of Contract.	Lowest Tender accepted.	Reason for acceptance.
War, Aerial . . .	B. 3567-3228, 2nd September 1922.	T. Bolton and Sons, Ltd.	200 14 10	231 0 6 (German Manufacturer)	Quicker delivery. The small difference in price would be further reduced by extra cost of inspection in Germany.
Dog Spikes . . .	B. 3997-5377, 28th September 1922.	W. Kelway Hamber . . .	265 2 6	240 2 4 (made in Belgium)	Quicker delivery offered. There was also much delay in shipping from Antwerp.
Iron Wire . . .	B. 4035-5192, 2nd October 1922.	Norman Long & Coy. . .	1,968 15 0	1,939 7 6 (German)	Small difference in cost and the extra expense that would be incurred by inspection in Germany. The British firm also offered much better delivery.
Cement . . .	B. 4174-5964, 4th October 1922.	Ship Canal Portland Cement Manufacturers, Ltd.	8 11 5 0 (11s. 1d. a Cask), (1,500 Casks)	637 10 0 (8s. 6d. a Cask), (Belgian Cement)	Quicker delivery. It was also not considered advisable to accept the Belgian Cement offered by the lowest tenderer until a report has been obtained on samples being made on a Contract now running with this firm.
Copper Plates . . .	B. 4000-6204, 8th November 1922.	Linky & Coy.	13,163 16 0	12,128 0 0	Superior trustworthiness. The lowest tender was from an English firm of locomotive makers for foreign plates forged by themselves. This is not considered nearly so satisfactory as obtaining plates forged by the copper makers.
Tyres for Locomotives . . .	B. 5166-6533, 5th December 1922.	Steel Coy. of Scotland, Ltd.	3,887 13 3	2,808 12 6 (German)	The correct supply of Locomotive Tyres is of the utmost importance and it was not considered a violation to place a further order with the German firm until they have established their reliability by completion of two other contracts which they already hold. The delivery offered by the English firm was also much quicker.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

IMPORT DUTY ON PAPER.

366. *Sir Montagu Webb: (1) Are Government aware:

- (a) That under the Finance Act, 1922, passed by the Legislature in March last, an import duty of fifteen per cent. ad valorem was imposed on paper? (Item 94 in Schedule II, Import Tariff); yet
- (b) That by a Notification "Customs Duties, No. 6705 of 23rd December, 1922, new items have been introduced into Schedule II of the Import Tariff under the heading Paper, namely, news printing paper, printing paper tints, real art, imitation art, etc., to which Tariff Valuations have been given in some cases more than twice the current market values of the papers mentioned, with the result that the present Import Duty on paper instead of being fifteen per cent. as laid down by the Finance Act, 1922, is now twenty to thirty-seven per cent.?

(2) Will Government be pleased to say what steps they propose to take to correct this deviation from the scale of duties authorised by the Legislature, so as to ensure that the duty on paper shall not be suddenly doubled or more by mere executive order?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: (1) (a) Yes.

(1) (b) and (2). These valuations were based on the prices of the previous years and were fixed in consultation with the principal Chambers of Commerce, and were not criticised at the time as being excessive. The Government of India have, however, further examined the matter in the light of information subsequently supplied and have ascertained that the valuations then fixed are somewhat above actual market prices, partly on account of the considerable fall which has taken place in the prices of paper during the last 4½ months, i.e., since the collection of the quotations on which the valuations were based. They have therefore revised the tariff valuations for this article, and a notification to this effect appeared in the Gazette of India of the 17th instant.

Sir Montagu Webb: Having regard to the fact that prices generally are now falling, will Government undertake from time to time to re-examine other tariff valuations so that the scale of duties authorised by the Legislature shall not be greatly exceeded?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: That, Sir, raises a big question. In exceptional cases we do reduce the valuations but not often. It would be against the whole object of tariff valuation to do so as a matter of course and the Honourable Member will see that if we reduce the valuation when prices fall we must also increase it when prices rise.

ARMS RULES COMMITTEE'S REPORT.

367. *Baba Ujagar Singh Bedi: (a) Will Government be pleased to state if they have accepted the recommendations of the Arms Rules Committee?

(b) What points of the Report they have accepted?

(c) Have the Government given any legal shape to those recommendations yet, if not, when are they going to be enforced as Law?

(d) Have they given any consideration to the Notes of Dissent, on the said Report, and if so, to what points?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: We hope very shortly to be in a position to make a statement on the subject.

WORKING OF CHIT ASSOCIATIONS AND NIDHIS IN MADRAS.

368. Mr. Narayandas Girdhardas: Will the Government be pleased to state whether they will call for a report from the Government of Madras as to whether in view of the inapplicability of several of the fundamental provisions of the Indian Companies Act, to Chit Associations and Nidhis, it is desirable to modify the Act to suit the constitution and working of these institutions?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: A letter on this subject has just been received within the last few days from the Southern Indian Chamber of Commerce and is under examination. This covers also the next question, No. 369.

WITHDRAWALS AND LOANS IN CONNECTION WITH NIDHIS AND CHIT ASSOCIATIONS.

369. Mr. Narayandas Girdhardas: Will the Government be pleased to state whether in the case of Nidhis and Chit Associations, withdrawals from, and loans on share capital are allowed against the provisions of the Indian Companies Act?

AUDITORS IN MADRAS.

370. Mr. Narayandas Girdhardas: Will the Government be pleased to state the number of Auditors certified as qualified to audit accounts for purposes of Income-tax in the Madras Presidency?

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: The information is being collected and will be supplied to the Honourable Member. This answer I am afraid I must ask him to accept to all the questions up to No. 375 inclusive.

INCOME-TAX ASSESSEES, MADRAS.

371. Mr. Narayandas Girdhardas: Will the Government be pleased to state the number of assesseees to Income-tax in the Madras Presidency on 31st March, 1922?

INCOME-TAX AUDITORS.

372. Mr. Narayandas Girdhardas: Will the Government be pleased to state whether it is a fact that since the passing of the Indian Income-tax Act of 1922, no additions to the list of qualified Auditors for Income-tax purposes have been made?

COMMITTEE ON INCOME-TAX AUDITORS.

373. Mr. Narayandas Girdhardas: (a) Will the Government be pleased to state under what provision of the Indian Income-tax Act of 1922, or the rules thereunder, the Commissioner of Income-tax for the Madras Presidency has constituted a Committee for the selection of Auditors for Income-tax purposes?

(b) Will the Government be pleased to state whether Commissioners of Income-tax in other Presidencies have constituted similar committees for the selection of Auditors for Income-tax purposes?

ENLISTMENT OF INCOME-TAX AUDITORS.

374. Mr. Narayandas Girdhardas: Will the Government be pleased to state whether any rules have been framed by the Commissioner of Income-tax for the Madras Presidency to regulate the enlistment of Auditors for Income-tax purposes? If so, will the Government be pleased to lay a copy on the table?

INCOME-TAX ASSESSEES.

375. Mr. Narayandas Girdhardas: Will the Government be pleased to lay on the table a statement of the number of Income-tax assesses in each of the major Provinces on the last day of the last official year, and also the latest number of qualified Auditors for Income-tax purposes in each of those major Provinces?

RAILWAY ADVISORY COUNCILS

376. Mr. B. S. Kamat: (i) Will Government be pleased to state for which of the Railway Administrations Local Advisory Councils have been established so far in terms of the recommendation of the Railway Committee, 1920-21?

(ii) In this connection, will Government also be pleased to give the constitution, the method of selection of the Members, the scope of duties, remuneration, if any, to Members, and the nature of proceedings of these Advisory Councils as fixed at present?

(iii) If Local Advisory Councils have been appointed for the G. I. P. and the B. B. C. I. Administrations, will Government be pleased to give the names of the Members?

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: (i) and (iii) Apart from the two committees on Eastern Bengal and East Indian Railways which have been for some years in existence no new Local Advisory Committees have yet been established in accordance with the revised principles referred to. Orders have however been issued for the formation of committees on the three State lines, and these will very shortly be constituted. The principles which are being followed on State-worked railways have been recommended to all Companies for adoption, and in most cases preliminary measures are believed to be now well advanced for the formation of similar committees on all the principal lines.

(ii) Government have confined themselves to formulating certain general principles in consultation with the Central Advisory Council, and detailed arrangements such as those referred to will necessarily be settled on each individual line to suit local circumstances. A copy of the memorandum of general principles prescribed is laid on the table.

Memorandum regarding Local Railway Advisory Committees.

I. Title.—The new bodies to be known on each line as "Railway Advisory Committee".

II. Constitution.—A separate main Committee to be constituted for each administration, the number of members being decided by circumstances subject to a maximum of 12. The Agent to be ex-officio Chairman. The remaining members to consist of :

two Local Government members nominated by the Local Government in whose jurisdiction the headquarters of the railway in question is situated ;

three representatives of the Legislative Council of the Government in whose jurisdiction the headquarters of the railway in question is situated. These members should be selected to represent rural interests and the travelling public ;

one member from the local municipality or corporation at the railway headquarters ;

five members representing industries, commerce and trade.

The heads of departments of railways may be called in merely to advise on subjects under discussion which may affect their department and on which their technical expert advice would be useful to the committee.

The method of selection of the non-official members to be left largely to local discretion. The representatives of the Legislative Council need not necessarily be members of the Council. Members of the Central Advisory Council are not debarred from membership of Local Advisory Committees. The five members representing industries, commerce and trade would ordinarily be drawn from important local bodies representing predominant trade interests ; the actual selection of such bodies should be made in consultation with the Local Government, and once the selection is made it should be left to them to nominate or elect their representatives. The tenure of office of the members to be left to the electing or nominating bodies to decide.

Agents will consider whether it is desirable to form separate branch local committees at large centres, and in case of doubt they may consult their main committee in this matter.

III. Scope of duties.—The functions of the committee to be purely advisory. The sort of subjects which might suitably be placed before the Committees are :

- (a) alterations in time tables and passenger services ;
- (b) alterations of rates and fares and changes of goods classifications ;
- (c) proposals in regard to new projects and extensions ;
- (d) proposal in regard to new rolling stock ;
- (e) any matters affecting the general public interest or convenience.

Questions of personnel, discipline and appointments will not be brought before the committee ; subject to this condition any member may suggest a subject for discussion, but the Agent may rule out any subject for reasons which should be explained at the first meeting after the ruling has been given.

IV. Remuneration.—Non-railway members may be paid Rs. 32 for each meeting attended.

V. Proceedings.—The committee to meet once a month if there are matters to be discussed. A copy of the minutes of meetings to be furnished to each member and to the Railway Board. If in any case the Agent decides that he is unable to follow the advice given by the majority of the committee, he must bring the matter to the notice of the Railway Board in forwarding the minutes of the meeting for their perusal.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: Would the Honourable Member please state how Members of this House can obtain information regarding the proceedings of these Committees?

The Honourable Mr. G. A. Innes: I am afraid I must ask for notice of that question.

RECOMMENDATIONS OF DECK PASSENGER COMMITTEE.

377. Mr. B. S. Kamat: (i) Will Government be pleased to state what action has been taken in the matter of the recommendations of the Deck Passenger Committee, 1921, so far as any amending legislation to amend the Indian Passenger Ships Act is concerned to improve space allowance?

(ii) Will Government also please state what steps, if any, have been taken to improve existing conditions in general and particularly in respect of the following recommendations of the said Committee, viz.:

- (a) Paragraph 68A, (ir) Shelter accommodation at ports;
- (b) Paragraph 68A, (v) better arrangements for Surf boats;
- (c) Paragraph 68A, (vi) embarking and disembarking;
- (d) Paragraph 68A, (viii) telegraphic communications between ports;
- (e) Paragraph 68A, (ix) night signalling between shore and adjacent villages;
- (f) Paragraph 68A, (xxiii) non-official visitors at important ports.

The Honourable Mr. C. A. Innes: The Government of India informed Maritime Local Governments in November, 1921, of the provisional conclusions they had come to on the more important recommendations contained in the Deck Passengers Committee's Report and asked them to consult Steamship Companies and public bodies on these questions and to furnish the Government of India with their views. A reply is still due from one important Local Government who have been asked to expedite the matter. Until this reply is received, it is impossible for Government to formulate final conclusions.

QUARTERS AT WINDSOR PLACE, RAISINA.

378. Rai Bahadur Lachmi Prasad Sinha: Will the Government be pleased to state—(a) How many quarters are still lying unoccupied at Windsor Place?

(b) Whether the rent of those quarters will be charged from the Honourable Members, for the whole Season, to whom they have been allotted or from the date of their occupation?

(c) If from the date of occupation, then who will be liable for rent of those unoccupied quarters, either for the unoccupied period or for the rest of the Session—in case the Members to whom they have been allotted do not owing to certain reasons come to Delhi or occupy them?

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: (a) Four quarters at Windsor Place were until a few days ago unoccupied.

(b) and (c) Quarters at Windsor Place have all been allotted on the basis of seasonal rents, and rent will be charged for the whole season whether the quarters are occupied or not unless the quarter is definitely relinquished. Where a Member relinquishes his quarter he is liable for the rent till a new tenant has been found.

ALLOTMENT OF QUARTERS AT RAISINA.

379. Rai Bahadur Lachmi Prasad Sinha: Will the Government be pleased to state if it will be possible for them to re-allot the Windsor Place quarters after allowing a certain reasonable period from the date of commencement of the Session for their occupation instead of keeping them vacant?

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Hitherto the practice has been that when a quarter at Windsor Place has been allotted to a member it is kept at that member's disposal even though he may not be occupying it until he definitely relinquishes it. Government will consider the Honourable Member's suggestion that a re-allotment of the vacant quarters should be made after the lapse of a reasonable period.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Having regard to the popularity of these quarters, will the Government be pleased to build more such quarters?

Colonel Sir Sydney Crookshank: We have taken out estimates for the construction of 10 additional quarters of this particular design and when the Finance Department are in a position to provide the funds and the Legislative Assembly vote the funds, the construction of these quarters will be put in hand.

WINDSOR PLACE QUARTERS UNOCCUPIED.

380. Rai Bahadur Lachmi Prasad Sinha: Will the Government be pleased to state as to how many Windsor Place quarters were unoccupied during the whole of the last Delhi Session?

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: None of the quarters at Windsor Place was unoccupied for the whole of the last Delhi Session.

TRAINING OF INDIANS IN ARTILLERY, ENGINEERING, ETC.

381. Mr. Ahmad Baksh: Will the Government be pleased to state what definite steps have been taken in the matter of training of Indians for Commissions in Artillery, Engineering, Air Force and Royal Marine in pursuance of the promise given in His Excellency the Viceroy's speech on the 3rd of September 1921 when opening the second session of the Indian Legislature at Simla printed on page 14, Volume II of the Legislative Assembly Debates?

Mr. E. Burdon: The question of the admission of Indians to the commissioned ranks of the Artillery and Engineer services in India, as well as the Royal Air Force in India, is still under consideration.

As regards the Royal Indian Marine, I invite the attention of the Honourable Member to the reply given on the 16th instant to unstarred question No. 180.

Mr. B. S. Kamat: May I ask the Government to consider the training of Indians for the Air Force?

Mr. E. Burdon: I have stated this in the reply which I gave. The matter is still under consideration.

MAINTENANCE OF STANDING ARMY IN INDIA.

382. Mr. P. P. Ginwala: With reference to the answer to my question No. 3, dated the 15th January 1923 (re the Statutory or other authority under which the Governor General in Council maintained a Standing Army in India), will the Government be pleased to state:

- (a) Whether it is not the fact that all the three Statutes therein cited have been repealed by the Government of India Act?
- (b) If the answer to (a) is in the affirmative, whether it is not the fact that there is no express statutory authority for the maintenance of a Standing Army in India?
- (c) If the answer to (b) is in the affirmative, under what other authority is the Standing Army in India maintained?

Mr. E. Burdon: I wish in the first instance to express my regret that the reply which I gave to the question on the same subject asked by my Honourable friend on the 15th January last was incorrect. This was due, I need hardly say, to inadvertence, and the Honourable Member's present question gives me an opportunity of setting the matter right. The answer to his question is as follows:

- (a) Of the three Statutes referred to, the East India Mutiny Act, 1754, was repealed by the Statute Law Revision Act, 1867, while the Government of India Act, 1833, and the Government of India Act, 1858, were repealed by the Government of India Act, 1915.
- (b) Yes.
- (c) Under the inherent power of the Crown.

Mr. P. P. Ginwala: May I ask what is meant by the inherent power of the Crown as applied to the Army in India?

Dr. H. S. Gour: May I also ask whether the inherent power of the Crown is invoked for the purpose of maintaining a Standing Army in Great Britain?

Mr. E. Burdon: The matter in the case of the United Kingdom is affected, I am advised, by the Bill of Rights, that is to say in the absence of the limitations on the power of the Crown imposed by the Bill of Rights those powers would be unlimited; and my Honourable friend is probably aware that the Bill of Rights has no application to India.

Mr. N. M. Samarth: Has the attention of the Auditor General been drawn to the expenditure incurred on the Standing Army in India?

Mr. E. Burdon: I do not think the Auditor General has overlooked it.

Mr. P. P. Ginwala: Do I understand that it is the view of the Government of India that the Governor General or the Governor General in Council exercises all the inherent powers of the Crown as they are understood in Great Britain?

Mr. President: That is a large question to ask the Army Secretary.

Dr. H. S. Gour: If the inherent power of the Crown is to maintain an Army, who pays for it?

Mr. E. Burdon: Surely the Honourable Member knows.

Dr. H. S. Gour: Is the Honourable Member aware of the fact that the revenues are not to be used under the Government of India Act, except to the extent authorised by that Statute?

Mr. E. Burdon: Certainly.

Dr. H. S. Gour: Then it follows that if the Crown has the power of maintaining an Army the Crown has not the inherent right of pledging the revenues of India except to the extent provided by the Statute and that statement makes no provision for the maintenance of an Army in India. Is that not so?

Mr. E. Burdon: Do I understand the Honourable Member is asking a question?

Dr. H. S. Gour: Yes.

Mr. E. Burdon: What is the question?

Dr. H. S. Gour: I will repeat it for the benefit of the Honourable Member. If I understood the Honourable Member aright, the Army in India is maintained in the exercise of the Royal Prerogative which my Honourable friend calls the inherent right of the Crown to maintain the Army of India. It does not extend to paying for the Army of India in view of the Government of India Act which lays down that the revenues of India cannot be hypothecated for any purpose except to the extent provided by the Statute and that Statute does not make any provision for the maintenance of an Army in India.

Mr. President: I did not observe any note of interrogation at the end of that statement.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar: In the self-governing Colonies, has the inherent power of the Crown ever been used for the purpose of maintaining a Standing Army?

Mr. President: The Army Secretary is not responsible for the administration of His Majesty's Overseas Dominions.

REGISTRATION OF NURSES TRAINED IN INDIA.

383. Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: 1. Will Government be pleased to state whether nurses trained in India can obtain registration under any rules made by the Imperial or Local Governments or under a Local or General Act?

2. If the reply is in the affirmative, would such registration be recognised by the General Nursing Council for England and Wales?

3. Are the Government of India aware of the fact that owing to the absence of a Registration Act in India many nurses who have been trained and qualified in India are refused registration in England and are thereby prevented from practising their profession and earning a livelihood?

4. Will Government be pleased to state whether they are:

- (a) prepared to introduce an All-India Nurses Registration Act, or
- (b) willing to recommend each Local Government to do so?

The Honourable Mr. A. C. Chatterjee: (1) There are no rules made by the Government of India under which nurses can obtain registration. Registration is possible in certain provinces under local or private arrangements. In Burma there is the Burma Midwives and Nurses Act, 1922.

(2) The Government of India have no information as to whether registration in Burma is recognised by the General Nursing Council for England and Wales.

(3) The Government of India are aware that nurses trained and qualified in India would be ineligible for registration in England, though the absence of registration would not preclude such nurses from practising their profession and earning a livelihood there.

(4) The Government of India have no such proposal under consideration.

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: Is the Government aware that the matter has been brought before the Local Councils and in one Council, the Central Provinces, the reply given to a similar question was disallowed under its rule 7 as it is an all-India question? Will the Government under those circumstances see their way to introducing all-India legislation?

The Honourable Mr. A. C. Chatterjee: I could not hear the last few words.

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: A question of a similar kind was asked in one of the Local Councils and the reply given in the Central Provinces Council was "Disallowed under Rule 7 as it is an all-India question." Under those circumstances I ask whether the Honourable Member for Government will be good enough to tell me whether he would, in the face of that answer, introduce all-India legislation.

The Honourable Mr. A. C. Chatterjee: I have no information of the proceedings in the Provincial Councils. The Honourable Member is aware that medical education is a provincial subject.

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: I am perfectly aware that it is a provincial subject but the provinces have refused to entertain such legislation. I now ask whether the Central Government will pass a Registration Act.

The Honourable Mr. A. C. Chatterjee: As I have said, we have no request from any Provincial Government.

UNSTARRED QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

SECRET SERVICE DEPARTMENT.

189. Mr. Saiyed Muhammad Abdulla: (a) What works are done by the Secret Service Department?

(b) How is it administered? Is it through special Agency or through the District officers and Political officers?

(c) What amounts were spent on it for the last 5 years?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: There is no Secret Service Department but as in all countries a sum—in India a very small sum—is set apart under the head of Secret Service contingencies for confidential enquiries and other measures in the interest of public security. I may mention that the amount so allotted was Rs. 2,50,000 for the years 1917-1920, in 1921-22, Rs. 2,80,000, and a considerably smaller sum will be required for 1922-23. The Honourable Member will readily understand that details of its administration cannot be given without prejudice to the purposes for which the allotment is made.

WOMEN'S MEDICAL SERVICE.

190. Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: (1) Will Government be pleased to state what is the ordinary period for which qualified lady doctors are kept on probation in the Senior Branch of the Women's Medical Service?

(2) Has it been found necessary to extend the period in any case: if so, in how many cases, and on what grounds has the extension of probation been insisted on and for what periods?

(3) What is the number of cases, falling under the category in question No. (2) in which confirmation in the service has entirely been notified?

The Honourable Mr. A. C. Chatterjee: The Women's Medical Service is not a Government service but Government are informed that the answers to the Honourable Member's questions are as follows:

(1) One year.

(2) Yes; in one case, on the ground that the person concerned had been transferred during the period of probation and the reports on the advisability of confirming her in the service were doubtful. Her period of probation was therefore extended in order to give her every opportunity of proving her capacity. The extension was for six months.

(3) If the last word in this question is intended for "refused" the reply is "one."

REVERSION OF MEN SERVING EX-INDIA DURING THE WAR.

191. Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney: (1) Will the Government of India be pleased to state whether Government servants who were serving temporarily under them and were placed on deputation ex-India during the war, were permitted to return to the Government of India at the conclusion of such deputation though their substantive posts were under a local Government? If not, why not?

(2) If any Government servants have been so reverted to their substantive posts, were they given any option in the matter before being placed on deputation?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: The information asked for by the Honourable Member is being collected and will be supplied to him when ready.

THE REPEALING AND AMENDING BILL.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith (Secretary, Legislative Department): Sir, I beg to move:

"That the Bill to amend certain enactments and to repeal certain other enactments be taken into consideration."

As this Bill involves no principle other than that of removing from time to time obsolete matter and formal defects from the Statute Book, I do not think I need make any further remarks in support of my motion.

Mr. President: The question is:

"That the Bill to amend certain enactments and to repeal certain other enactments be taken into consideration."

The motion was adopted.

Clauses 1, 2, 3 and 4 were added to the Bill.

Mr. President: Schedule I.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Sir, as I explained the other day in asking for leave to introduce this Bill, we find from time to time and often very frequently that defects are created in our Statute Book by changes of circumstances. Sir, after this Bill was printed off and ready for introduction, it was brought to our notice that amendments had been necessitated in our Statute Book by an Act which was passed in 1922 in Burma in respect of provisions which applied only in Burma; and until we in the Central Legislature amend those provisions in a corresponding manner, they will have to stand in our Statute. Therefore, Sir, the amendments which I am proposing are merely to bring our Statute Book into line with the law of the province of Burma, which has been amended by the Burma Courts Act, 1922. The amendments are of a purely formal nature. Sir, I move—

“ That in the First Schedule—

(a) the entry in the fourth column relating to the Indian Divorce Act, 1869, be renumbered ‘(1)’ and after that entry the following be added, namely :

‘(2) In section 3, clause (2) for the word ‘Divisional’ the word ‘District’ shall be substituted’;

(b) after the entry relating to the Court Fees Act, 1870, the following entry be inserted, namely :

‘1877 1 The Specific Relief Act, In Section 45 for the words ‘and Bombay’ the words ‘Bombay and Languon’ shall be substituted’.”

The motion was adopted.

The first Schedule, as amended, was added to the Bill.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Sir, I move :

“ That in the Second Schedule—

(a) after the entry relating to the Trustees and Mortgagees’ Powers Act, 1866, the following entry be inserted, namely :

‘1870 VII The Court Fees Act, in Schedule I, Article 15.’
1870.

(b) in the fourth column of the entry relating to the Code of Civil Procedure, 1908, the following be added, namely :

‘(3) In section 123, sub-section (2) the words ‘(in Burma)’.’

(c) for the heading ‘Regulation by the Governor General in Council’ the heading ‘Regulations by the Governor General in Council’ be substituted and under that heading before the entry relating to the Upper Burma Civil Courts Regulation, 1896, the following entry be inserted, namely :

‘1892 V The Upper Burma Criminal Justice Regulation, In the Schedule, section I and sub-sections (1) to (4) of section II and section X’.” 1892.

The motion was adopted.

The Second Schedule, as amended, was added to the Bill.

The Title and Preamble were added to the Bill.

Sir Henry Moncrieff Smith: Sir, I move that the Bill, as amended, be passed.

Mr. President: The question is that the Bill to amend certain enactments and to repeal certain other enactments, as amended, be passed.

The motion was adopted.

THE GOVERNMENT SAVINGS BANKS (AMENDMENT) BILL.

Colonel Sir Sydney Crookshank (Secretary, Public Works Department): Sir, I beg to move for leave to introduce a Bill further to amend the Government Savings Banks Act, 1873.

The Bill which I have the honour to present to this House—a Bill which Honourable Members will observe is of a very simple character and non-controversial—marks a further step on the road of affording facilities and convenience to the public offered by the Posts and Telegraph Department which is so ably administered by my Honourable friend, Mr. Sams. We desire here to expedite the payment of Cash Certificates and Savings Bank deposits to the heirs of deceased depositors by relieving Post-Masters General of the duty of sanctioning the payment of such deposits where they are small in amount and thus decentralizing this work on to Head Post-Masters. By this Bill Head Post-Masters will be empowered to calculate the interest due and to close accounts without reference to the Post-Master General of the Circle when the amount involved does not exceed Rs. 100. The alteration does not throw any liability on Government and reduces the routine work and, generally speaking, benefits the community, that is to say, the small depositor, and facilitates business generally. We have already made an experiment with this practice since 1919 in the case of Cash Certificates and we have found that there has been no trouble and the procedure has worked very satisfactorily. We are therefore anxious to regularise the procedure. Sir, I commend my Bill to the House.

Mr. President: The question is that leave be given to introduce a Bill further to amend the Government Savings Banks Act, 1873.

The motion was adopted.

Colonel Sir Sydney Crookshank: Sir, I introduce the Bill.

THE INDIAN PAPER CURRENCY BILL.

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett (Finance Member): Sir, I beg to move:

"That the Bill to consolidate the law relating to the Government Paper Currency be taken into consideration."

The motion was adopted.

Clause 1 was added to the Bill.

Clauses 2 to 30 were added to the Bill.

The Schedule was added to the Bill.

The Title was added to the Bill.

The Preamble was added to the Bill.

The Honourable Sir Basil Blackett: Sir, I move that the Bill be passed.

Mr. President: The question is:

"That the Bill to consolidate the law relating to the Government Paper Currency be passed."

The motion was adopted.

THE CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey (Home Member): I beg to move:

"That the Bill further to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, the European Vagrancy Act, 1874, the Indian Limitation Act, 1908, and the Central Provinces Courts Act, 1917, in order to provide for the removal of certain existing discriminations between European British subjects and Indians in criminal trials and proceedings, be taken into consideration."

I briefly referred a few days ago, in discussing the programme of business to be laid before the House, to the reasons why I proposed to make this motion. The House will perhaps excuse me if I give those reasons to-day at somewhat greater length. I am sure that I shall be acquitted of any desire to rush this measure through the Legislature. As I said the other day in introducing the measure, it is intended to provide some solution for a controversy which has lasted 40 years; and whatever one's anxiety to see the consummation of our hopes of a solution, whatever the satisfaction of Government at securing the seal of the Legislature on an agreement arrived at between the two communities: yet no one could plead that it is a matter of the highest urgency or that it is of real urgency that we should pass this Act either this week or this month or next. I could not therefore plead that it is necessary to omit the stage of Select Committee and proceed at once to consideration in order to avoid the lapse of time. Anxious therefore as I was to proceed, I thought it well to discuss with many of my friends in the House the procedure which they would prefer in the matter. I found that there were some who thought that we ought to have a Select Committee; but there were others, and these were in the majority, who thought that no Select Committee was necessary, for the reason that they foresaw in any case a considerable number of amendments. Those amendments, they thought, would come forward whether we held a Select Committee or not, because they were amendments of principle; they were amendments not of detail but amendments affecting the whole basis of the compromise on which the Bill was based. So much for the opinions of my friends in the House. Now, a Select Committee is usually called for and justified when a measure is put forward by Government in pursuance of some end of Government policy. But here we have a measure which is based not on the views of Government but on the recommendations of a Committee on which there were only three Government Members, and the drafting of the Bill to give effect to those recommendations has been all the simpler because the Committee contained so preponderating an amount of high legal talent. Then again, a Select Committee is frequently called for—and again I say it is frequently justified—in order that the press and public of the country may have time to digest a complicated measure, and, if necessary, to formulate its criticisms on the proposals. Now, I have carefully watched the press since our Bill was introduced. I have tried as far as possible to follow also other expressions of public opinion, but our only guide has been the press, for I do not think that we have been addressed by a single public association or public body on the subject. I do not think that I have seen notice of a single public meeting. Our only guide therefore has been the press, and I think I may say that I have nowhere seen a demand that further time should be given for assimilation of this measure. Indeed, it appears to me that the press, having made its criticisms and given its directions to the country as the press will do, has been content to leave the matter there, in other words to await the decision of this Legislature. These are the reasons why I thought that we might well proceed directly to the stage of consideration; I think the public generally will be satisfied that we are justified in doing so; indeed I would not put the motion forward on any other ground.

Now, I come to the Bill itself. If my motion for consideration is carried we shall shortly be discussing amendments which deal both with the principle and the details comprised in the Bill. I have already in introducing the Bill referred to the circumstances in which the Bill was framed, and the light in which we would seek to have it regarded. Important, almost momentous as it is, I said nevertheless that Government did not claim too much for it. We put forward no extravagant estimates of what it achieved. I made it clear that we did not regard it as the sole, or as the final or as a permanent solution of a controversy which had troubled our predecessors so greatly, which indeed they must have felt to be insoluble. We regarded it as an advance, but an advance all the more valuable because it was obtained by way of compromise and of mutual sacrifice. I say all the more valuable, but I feel that the word is inadequate in dealing with an achievement so important, for the fact that those sacrifices have been made by two communities on a matter on which they feel so deeply, is not in itself only a proof that we shall some day find the solution of this difficulty, but it is more; it is a proof that there is in this country that temper of statesmanship which will not only help us to see an end of a difficulty such as this, but affords a guarantee that we can face with confidence even greater difficulties in our political future.

I said, Sir, the solution is not final, and perhaps it may not be satisfactory in all its details, but that it is the very essence of a compromise. You could not expect a compromise on a matter affecting two communities so deeply which would leave either of the two perfectly satisfied. And in practical matters of ordinary life, when some great issue is at stake, whom do we choose as our guide and our counsellor? Do we choose the man who by prudent abatement of part of his demand secures the substance of what he aims at, or do we follow the intransigent, the inflexible, the impracticable man who stands out for every jot and tittle of his demand, until in the end he so frequently loses the whole? We choose the former, but indeed I do not think I need dilate on this aspect of the question, because, as far as I am able to determine, the public at large has accepted the fact that this was an occasion which justified compromise, and that the terms of settlement does actually constitute both an advance and an improvement. If there has been criticism—criticism, I mean of the type of which we need take account here—if there has been criticism it turns in main not on the recommendations of the Committee, but on the fact that in certain respects our Bill has modified those recommendations at the instance of His Majesty's Government; I am choosing my words advisedly, and I say His Majesty's Government and not the Secretary of State. I have seen it stated that it is a matter for disappointment, indeed that it is a matter for resentment, that the terms of the Committee's recommendations have been so modified. I will put the case as clearly and as fairly as possible to the House and I ask the House to judge of what I say with equal fairness. It has been stated—I think I heard a murmur just now which confirms me in saying so—that the instructions we have received on the subject are the instructions of a reactionary Secretary of State, no friend of India. Well, let us have the truth. The instructions which we have received on the matter with which for the moment we are mostly concerned (namely, the position of subjects of the Dominion Governments) are the instructions of His Majesty's Government as a whole, communicated to the Secretary of

[Sir Malcolm Hailey.]

State as the condition on which he could give the approval which is necessary under section 65 of the Government of India Act. I say, with all sincerity, that I believe that those instructions would have been given by the preceding Government, perhaps by any preceding Government. I do not believe—again I speak with all sincerity—I do not believe that these directions involve any change of policy or any new angle of vision in regard to India. They represent simply the result of a calculation of the balance of advantages of two alternatives in respect to a question of great imperial importance. Let me explore that subject, if I may, for a minute. What is the essence of the demand which was made by the Committee, and which has been so largely made in India generally, that the status which the dominion subject now enjoys should be withdrawn? Obviously, the demand cannot be motivated merely by a spirit of reprisal, in view of the disabilities which Indians suffer in many of the dominions or the slight which is felt that those disabilities have caused on the name and fame of India. As I say, the motive cannot be merely that of reprisal, for to legislate as an act of revenge without any consideration of the future advantages or disadvantages of such an act would not be the act of a serious Legislature, and indeed were anybody to put that motive or argue that reason before the Legislature, I should feel that he was depreciating the judgment of the Legislature by doing so. It is of course—I think this is obvious—it is of course the fact that this demand was put forward as providing an instrument of negotiation, in other words to help to secure the speedy execution of the reciprocity Resolution on the part of those dominions which had agreed to it, and further to help to secure agreement to the Resolutions by those dominions who have not already so engaged themselves. It was, I say, put forward as an instrument of negotiation. The only question which His Majesty's Government had to ask themselves—and indeed which the Assembly will now have to ask itself—is whether that was an effective instrument? What we want to secure is fair immigration laws as applied to Indians and due extension of franchise as regards Indian settlers in the Dominions. The Dominions are independent. You can only secure measures of that kind by two methods, first, by enforcing compliance by a threat of consequences so grave as to cause serious apprehensions to the Dominions affected, or in the second alternative, by persuading the Dominions that it is to their advantage to give way, because your friendship and your good-will may be of value to them, either on grounds peculiar to them or on Imperial grounds. There is no other way. Yet take the facts. The number of Colonials in this country is so infinitesimal, that if you withdraw their existing rights from them, the only result will be to impose some disability on them; it will certainly not involve consequences so serious to the Dominions that they will on that account feel bound to give way to you in regard to questions on which they feel strongly, namely, immigration and franchise. It is unlikely, then, that this act of legislation would secure any result as a threat, the first alternative is therefore gone. Then, as for the second alternative, namely, persuasion, would it succeed there? Obviously not because it would create an estranged and not an improved atmosphere, and an improved atmosphere is obviously what you require to effect your immediate purpose. Indeed, one might perhaps go further and say not only that the proposed legislation would fail either as a threat or a means of persuasion, but it might have actually another consequence, harmful in itself. It might harden the Dominions in any action they are taking or proposing to take in regard to Indians already settled in their country. In that case, the weapon would have turned in your own hands. Now, I do not ask you to accept the whole of these arguments or conclusions; it is unnecessary for my purpose that I should do so. I only put them forward to demonstrate to the House that such arguments and such conclusions can be held without implying prejudice against India or over-affection for the Colonies or callousness in regard to the claims of Indians settled in the Colonies. If it is held that the arguments or the conclusions are not in themselves evidence of such prejudice, then my case is complete. Obviously the decision of His Majesty's Government is not prompted by any undue desire to support the cause of the Colonies or Dominions as against India, or by any lack of feeling for India itself. It merely involved a decision that, on the whole, present legislation of this type was likely to effect no good and might do harm. And indeed, Sir, I should not be astonished if there were not many thinking Indians who are now arriving at something of the same conclusion. Now I have dealt, I fear at some length, with this aspect of the question, not in order to anticipate arguments that may be raised in the course of the discussion on the amendments, but for one purpose only. I am by no means averse to India protesting against decisions of His Majesty's Government with which it does not find itself in accord. I am by no means averse to this Legislature taking a strong stand, if necessary, when it thinks it is being injured by the attitude of the Home Government; but I am anxious that this measure should be treated only on its merits and that its judgment should not be obscured by prejudice derived from a false reading of the attitude of His Majesty's Government. Sir, if I speak further on the Bill, it would, I fear, be trespassing on ground covered by amendments which must be discussed subsequently on the floor of the House. And I shall say nothing more to commend the Bill to the Assembly, for, I feel that if a Bill, the primary object of which is to still a controversy, an old and long-standing controversy between two great communities, and which is based on a compromise involving both concessions and sacrifices by the representatives of those two communities, if such a Bill does not commend itself to the Assembly, no words of mine can help, I will only say this in conclusion. Close now the long chapter of the past, take your account as it will stand if you pass this Bill and see what is the result. What shall we have gained? First, we shall have gained a settlement by compromise, an achievement which in itself transcends its details. Secondly, we shall have gained this, that the extent of the special privileges of the European will have been reduced to a minimum, while Indians themselves will have gained an improvement in trial procedure in many respects, for instance, appeals, Habreas Corpus, and the like. Thirdly, that we shall have in our new procedure, the provision for appeals by Government on fact as well as law which we hope will prevent some of those miscarriages of justice in important cases of which Indians have frequently complained. Fourthly, and I attach equal importance to this, the European having no special procedure of his own, will no longer fail to be interested in the general progress of the administration of justice in this country. Indeed he will be vitally interested in it, and that will be all to the advantage of India. Once again, I wish to advance no extravagant claims on behalf of this Bill. I wish to speak in the language of strict moderation. But if India at large does not regard this advance as solid, substantial, and satisfactory, if it does not press you, its representatives, to carry this measure into law, then indeed the historian of the future might charge it with lack of foresight and political prevision. But I myself have too robust a confidence in the political sense of India to fear any such contingency.

Sir Campbell Rhodes (Bengal: European): Sir, I do not think the House will consider me at all irrelevant on the subject matter we are now discussing if in my opening remarks I express the pleasure of the whole House at the re-appearance on the front Bench of Sir Malcolm Hailey. We trust, Sir, that he will soon be restored to his accustomed health, and I think we all pay our tribute to his courage at rising from a sick bed to come here to do his duty. We miss, Sir, from the front Bench to-day two men, Sir William Vincent and Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru, who played a very important part in the negotiations which have led to the introduction of this Bill, and I think we want to remember to-day with some gratitude the important part they played. As one of the representatives of the largest body of the community chiefly affected by this Bill I felt that I could not let it pass with a silent vote. When I spoke on the Honourable Mr. Samarth's Resolution in Simla in September 1921, I said that, though we Europeans desired no change, we were not averse to exploring fresh avenues. Well, Sir, those avenues have been explored at great length and at some considerable delay, and the result is found first in the report and then in the Bill now before us. I should not be true, Sir, to my constituents, nor should I be adopting a frank attitude with this House if I were to say that we are entirely pleased with the resulting Bill that is before us to-day. But as Sir Malcolm Hailey has pointed out, it is impossible to please every one in a compromise and our chief dissatisfaction probably centres round the summons cases. At the same time, if we have had to make sacrifices, I shall be the first to recognise that my Indian friends have also had to make sacrifices, and have done so with cheerfulness and with a determination that somehow or other we should reach a fair compromise. I should like to pay my tribute, Sir, to that Committee which tackled this subject with so much courage, so much determination, with so great a determination to see that some way should be found out of this very great difficulty which, for the last 40 years, has been in our midst. I have put one small amendment on the paper. Others have been suggested to me, but I have the authority of the largest corporate body of my constituents, the European Association, to refrain from putting any amendments on the paper at all which would go outside the compromise reached by the Committee. We had as our representative on the Committee one of our most distinguished Europeans, a gentleman who is in the inner circle of the European Association, and who, I am pleased to say, will succeed me as President of the Bengal Chamber. There is one right from which we have to some extent 12 Noon. been debarred in the past, to which I now hope we shall attain under this Bill, I mean that elementary right of every man to be believed to be innocent even though he has been acquitted. (Laughter.) In the debate to which I referred my Honourable friend, Munshi Iswar Saran, whose absence to-day I regret, paid me the compliment of saying that my remarks on that occasion were a sugar-coated quinine pill. I think he paid me more of a compliment than he really intended. Well, Sir, we have the quinine pill without the sugar coating before us to-day, but I hope it will perform its proper quinine functions and abate those fevered passions which have oppressed us these forty years.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary (Calcutta: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Sir, I desire to join my friend, Sir Campbell Rhodes, in the expression of our pleasure in welcoming back in our midst the Honourable the Leader of the House after his illness. A few occasions could be more appropriate for his return to the scene of his labours. He is animated with the desire to do contrary to what was done hundreds of years ago by the great Moghul.

Aurangzeb was no friend of music—concord—and he forbade it. Some people, who wanted to be sarcastic and humorous at the same time, but did not venture to go direct against the Emperor's wishes organised a funeral party. The Emperor when passing by asked whose funeral it was. The reply was "Sire, it is the funeral of concord—music—which the Emperor has destroyed, and we are going to bury it." The Emperor said "Bury it deep, so that it may not raise its head again"; and concord never more raised its head again in the Moghul Empire. To-day the scene has changed. It is discord of forty years' standing and more that we are asked to bury. We hope we shall bury it deep so that it may not raise its head again. I say therefore that I am glad that Sir Malcolm should be in our midst to assist us in this burial and appeal to us and through us to the country to bury discord deep.

I am afraid, Sir, I am one of those who do view the whittling down of the compromise, so far as it has been whittled down, with what Sir Malcolm calls disappointment and resentment. The two communities agree to make sacrifices but that did not please the supreme authorities, it does not matter to us whether it was what has been called the reactionary Secretary of State, the big brother with his big stick, of whom we have so often heard, or whether it was his big brothers, the big four or the big three in the Cabinet, as according to the time the number may be. They tell us what we should do because section 65 of the Government of India Act is there and gives the Secretary of State certain powers. So far as the Dominions and Colonies are concerned section 65 of that Act has to my mind no bearing, although clause (3) of section 65 has an enormous bearing so far as European British subjects in this country are concerned. The only reason why we should be prepared to accept things as they are presented, is, in the Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey's language, because this is neither final nor permanent, but is a further temporary compromise. I agree that, so far as the Dominions and Colonies are concerned, we should do nothing now that would jeopardise the future settlement on a satisfactory basis of those differences about which we have had frequent occasions of raising protests in this Chamber and elsewhere. I agree with the Right Honourable Mr. Srinivasa Sastri that retutation or reprisal of a rank type should be the last arrow to leave our quiver, and, whether that arrow will have to be taken out or not, the near future will show. I do believe that, when the time comes for us to take that arrow out, section 65 of the Government of India Act will not stand in our way.

Sir, I shall not anticipate the motion of which we have notice that the matter should be referred to a Select Committee. I am afraid, if we are to have another Select Committee, it will be in the language of the Standing Order really asking for a recommitment of the Bill to the Select Committee, and I shall await with interest the reasons for which that demand is to be made. (Mr. N. M. Samarth: "If it is at all made.") If it is at all made, says Mr. Samarth. I do not know if Mr. Samarth is more in the confidence of Dr. Gour than I am, because I see it tabled on the papers, but I believe, Sir, it will be unnecessarily impeding the burial of that unsightly thing which we have sought to see buried for 40 years. Supposing you do get a Select Committee, how will the matters be advanced? We had Mr. Abul Kasem, Mr. Samarth, Mr. Rangachariar, Colonel Gidney and, last, though by no means the least, Dr. Gour himself, on the former Committee and, therefore, the recommitment to the Select Committee will have to be more than justified. But, I shall not anticipate that for the moment. I believe the whole House, whatever the intensity of feeling on some of the grounds may be, are united that this Bill being the furthest that Government will now possibly go, it will be best for us to accept it and see what the future will yield. There is acute disappointment on both sides and with those feelings, Sir, I should like to give the motion my support. And in passing, I cannot help feeling, if this Bill is passed, that we shall be having a succession of red letter days, in the language of my friend to the left, who was himself responsible for one red letter day by the acceptance of the principle that, so far as fiscal policy is concerned, India shall be master in her own house. I regret the absence of my revered friend and leader, Sir Sivaswamy Aiyer, who made himself responsible for the motion which resulted in the momentous announcement of His Excellency the Commander-in-Chief not many hours ago. And, to-day, at the instance of my friend, Mr. Samarth, we are considering the rectification of a measure which has been galling to the minds, the better minds of India and its statesmen, who want to bring about a state of things that will make the European and the Indian work hand in hand together. Sir, as I said once before in this Assembly, and it will bear repetition, in the Swaraj which we visualise for ourselves, the Hindu and the Muhammadan have a place, as a matter of right, and so has the European. The Muhammadan has been with us a few hundred years more than the European; but the European is here on his own title as the Muhammadan. Therefore, in anything you may do, be as circumspect as you can be to see that the friendly relations now growing up between all these communities is in no way jeopardised; and this Bill, when passed, will be a further step in that direction and, more than that, a good step.

Mr. T. V. Seshagiri Ayyar (Madras: Nominated Non-Official): Sir, I may be permitted to join in the welcome which has been extended to the Honourable Sir Maceola Hailey: He has come in good time to guide us on this important occasion. Sir, no part of the House felt his absence more than we on this side of the House, and his speech this morning shows how cleverly he can sugar-coat a very bitter pill, and therefore, Sir, his presence is very welcome. Sir, I feel myself in agreement with everything that Sir Campbell Rhodes has said, only from a slightly different standpoint. Sir Campbell Rhodes said that he was not quite satisfied with the Bill because as regards summons cases his community did not get as much as was expected from the compromise. From our side, Sir, we also feel that the Bill is not everything that we desire. If the House will remember aright, when my Honourable friend, Mr. Samarth, brought forward his motion, that which underlay the Resolution was the fear which has long been entertained in this country that justice is not being meted out to those Europeans who are committing offences against Indians. It is on that ground that the agitation became clamant, that some endeavour should be made to see that justice is properly done. Sir, no doubt my friends on this side and the European members have put their heads together, weighed the pros and cons and have come to a decision which they consider is the only proper solution of the problem at present. As was pointed out by the Honourable the Home Member, this is the beginning of the break in the privilege which we hope may continue and may ultimately result in removing all vestiges of difference between subjects and subjects of His Imperial Majesty. At the same time, Sir, we must say that the compromise is not wholly acceptable to the country from the fact that it does not deal with the crying evil for which the Committee was appointed, namely, the removal of all possibilities of miscarriage of justice. No doubt Indians have acquired certain rights along with their European brethren. That is one step in advance. But that is not the real idea which underlay the agitation against the distinction which is found in the Criminal Procedure Code. However, Sir, there is no doubt that a very honest attempt has been made both by the European Members of the Committee and by the Indian Members of the Committee to reach a compromise which would be regarded as the beginning of the removal of all distinctions between man and man in the Criminal Procedure Code and in securing to the accused a proper right of defence and to the persons who have been offended against speedy and sure justice. Sir, in that spirit, I also welcome the Bill which has been introduced. At the same time I cannot help feeling that there has been undue interference by somebody in higher authority with the principle which has been recognised both by the Government of India and the Committee. The Honourable the Home Member referred to the fact that it is necessary to make concessions in order that Indians may receive proper treatment in the Colonies. Sir, I think that is not the proper attitude or frame of mind with which this question should be tackled. The more you concede, the more you will be regarded as timid, as not self-respecting, and as not able to stand on your rights. If we are satisfied that concessions would bring us magnanimity from the other side, generosity from the other side, we shall be very happy to make concessions. But we, Sir, are afraid that concessions may be regarded as indicating weakness and may induce those gentlemen to say that they would use violence even in securing the ordinary rights of citizenship by our fellow-countrymen in the Colonies. That is our fear. Otherwise, Sir, we shall be most happy to meet them more than half way if it is possible to secure from our countrymen just and equal rights. It is because we are afraid that this is not possible that we regret that the Honourable the Home Member should have said that the recognition of the rights of the colonials would in any way help to settle the rights of Indians in these Colonies. Sir, although that is our belief, we think that the exercise of authority by the Secretary of State should not be regarded as rendering so futile the fundamental principle as to induce us to throw out the whole Bill. We think that it is absolutely necessary that we should make a beginning in regard to this matter and, so far as I know, my friends on this side of the House are prepared to assist the Government Bench in their desire to see that this Bill is passed, and we would assure the Honourable the Home Member that there is no desire to go back upon the compromise which has been come to by our friends and by their European colleagues.

Colonel Sir Henry Stanyon (United Provinces: European): Sir, I speak as a member of the European community. I am untrammelled by any rules of official discipline or of subordination to official etiquette. I speak as a non-official European—a member of the community of British India. It would be idle for me to attempt to assume a pose of impartial arbiter between what I may call two parties to this now expiring controversy. I speak on behalf of one of those parties. But none the less, I speak as a friend, albeit a European friend, of India; and I address myself, through you, Sir, to a House which I know, even from my short experience, to be full of Indian friends of Europeans. I unhesitatingly join in congratulating the Racial Distinctions Committee on their report. It is a report which is as impartial and straightforward as it is courageous.

[Colonel Sir Henry Stanyon.]

I do not accept or agree with all the recommendations contained in it, but that is a mere matter of detail. That does not take away from the merit of the report. And then, Sir, we come to this Bill. We have had Honourable Members of this House rightly pressing forward on more than one occasion to bring this matter to a head and to a conclusion. If any amendment is moved to refer this Bill back to a Select Committee, I shall strongly oppose that amendment, if I happen to catch your eye, Sir. But, at present, I speak only on the general question whether this Bill should be taken into consideration. The Bill represents the first serious attack upon the virus of race antagonism and racial distrust which has been very largely disseminated recently by poisonous tongues and pens, and which stands in the way of our national advance, and I say, let us all means use this antidote as soon as possible and without any delay. It is an entirely novel step in legislation, and though it is practicable to theorise to any extent upon the different details of it, we can have nothing but theory at present. Sir, if I want to find out whether a new pair of shoes made for me are comfortable and a good fit, I like to wear them for a bit, till I am in a position to say whether they require alteration. That, I think, is our position with regard to this Bill. It is not the Legislature that will be on trial under it. It will be the Judges and the juries, upon whom responsibility will be cast in a new way, who will be on their trial. If those Judges and those juries acquit themselves well,—if they punish crime because it is crime,—give fair trial because the giving of fair trial is in accordance with the highest ideals of administrative jurisprudence—fearlessly acquit unless they are convinced of guilt irrespective of religion, caste, race or any such considerations—then, I think, this enactment when it becomes law will be justified. It is only by trial and by such encouragement as we give to our judiciary by reposing confidence in them that we can administer this useful antidote, and a removal of distrust between man and man can ever be accomplished. I look forward to the day when we shall not want any mixed juries or any special modes of trial—when the general body of the public, English and Indian, will be satisfied that a decision given by a Court or a finding given by a jury, however wrong, however mistaken, is honest and impartial. When public opinion rises to that standard, then, no doubt, our judiciary will also endeavour to maintain the level of that reputation. But the whole thing is this, that this measure must be tried. My own feeling is in entire accord with that of the constituents who have sent me here. As the Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey has pointed out, in a compromise the best sign that it is a just compromise is that neither party is wholly satisfied. As a Judge I always thought that I had done my best when both sides denounced me as wrong. Therefore, though there is much here that we Europeans would like to alter,—much that we may regard as calculated to take away privileges, and so on—we prefer, and I am told to do so, to close our eyes and to accept the measure with both hands out as a compromise. Let this House take the Bill as it stands, without any theoretical tinkering with it at this stage, and try it. Let us go to the country with this measure and say, "Here is a measure which all classes and creeds and races are now given as a token of good feeling and justice." Therefore, without elaborating these remarks or entering into any details, my submission to this House is that we should accept this measure wholesale and pass it as soon as possible so that we can see by its trial in the country how this very great experiment works.

Rai Bahadur Bakshi Sohan Lal (Jullundur Division: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, I am most thankful for the very hard labours and the earnest desire on the part of the Members of the Racial Distinctions Committee to remove racial distinctions between Indians and Europeans in the administration of criminal justice in this country. But, Sir, I am extremely sorry that I cannot give them the credit of removing all racial distinctions in the administration of such justice as announced by His Excellency the Viceroy in more than one of his speeches, and as it was resolved upon in the Resolution of the Legislative Assembly on the 15th September 1921 and the instructions contained in the Home Department Resolution No. F-105, dated the 27th December 1921. Rather, if I go into the question from the very earliest time, it appears that the lapse of time has strengthened the differences between the two communities. The despatch of 1833 of the Court of Directors directed the removal of all racial distinctions in the trial of Europeans and Indians. That was the mentality of the British nation and the British Government in 1833. Fifty years later, that is, in 1883, there was no unanimity on the part of the British people, or the British nation or the British Government to remove all those distinctions, but still there were, at that time, a few voices at least of the Englishmen for removing these distinctions, such as we find in the speeches of Mr. Ilbert and some of his colleagues in the Council of 1883. Now, after forty years more, so far as I have been able to see there is not a single European who would concede to the Indian an equal status. So, the things are going from bad to worse as time passes. In 1883 it was said that it was a compromise on which they were acting. The same story is repeated now that we are effecting a compromise, and at the same time it is stated that this is a long-standing exercise of rights on the part of Europeans which cannot be done away with at once but that it will be done away with gradually. I respectfully submit that this was the very view which was taken in 1883 and that view has not changed. The bias, or what we may say, racial hatred continued just as it was in 1883, rather I should say it has grown stronger by lapse of time. If the matter is to be considered as a compromise we already have had a compromise in 1883, and there was no necessity of a second compromise after 40 years in 1923. We ought to have boldly decided whether the Indians and Europeans are to be treated on an equal footing and on equal considerations before courts of justice or not. It is not a matter of compromise. It is a matter of our national self-respect. In admitting the Bill as presented, we are admitting that we are inferior to the Europeans, that the Europeans belong to a superior race and we belong to an inferior race, that we are a subject race and that Europeans are victors, that their civilisation is much higher than that of ours. Are we admitting this or are we having any regard for our national respect in admitting the Bill which has been presented? If the Home Member or any other Member can tell me that what has been held in the Bill as good for Indians has also been held as good for Europeans, I would accept it. If the punishment of whipping is suitable for Indians, why is it not also suitable for Europeans? If not, how can it be said that Indians and Europeans have been placed on the same footing. If whipping degenerates the spirit of Englishmen, it also degenerates the spirit and freedom of Indians. There is a Magistrate, call him a District Magistrate or a first class Magistrate specially empowered under section 30. He can pass a sentence of 7 years upon an Indian but he cannot pass a sentence of more than 2 years upon an European. Is the liberty and independence or the life of an European more valuable than that of an Indian? Either sections 30 and 34 of the Criminal Procedure Code are to be repealed

altogether and the same Magistrate should be given power to administer justice against Indians and against Europeans equally or there is no reason why the Magistrate if the accused is an Indian should have the power of imprisoning him for 7 years and if the accused is an European he should not imprison him for more than 2 years. The same is the case in smaller cases. If a second or third class Magistrate can be trusted to pass a sentence of imprisonment on an Indian, there is no reason why he should not try a case punishable with imprisonment in which an European is concerned. There are many other matters, but these are some of the instances in which Englishmen and Indians should be put on the same footing. I am not claiming that the Indians should have a preferential right over Europeans. I am claiming that Indians and Europeans should be placed on the same footing at least before the sacred altar of courts of justice and that is the only way in which we can remove our differences. What will be the effect of this Bill? This Bill will rather perpetuate these differences. It has been stated that the Europeans have exercised these rights for the last hundred years and that they have made a great sacrifice of those rights but after a few years those rights will be still stronger and their sacrifices will be still greater. Are we going to perpetuate these rights for ever and are we going to be told always that it is a matter of compromise between the two communities and not a final settlement? No one ever said that it was a final settlement in 1883 and the same thing is repeated here. Whether this is due to the decision of the Secretary of State in Council or because the European communities cannot possibly give in, we are not to congratulate ourselves or the Committee in bringing about this compromise. I specially submit that this is not a matter of compromise and the matter ought to have been decided according to the principles of law and justice, according to what are the laws in other countries. I have not been able up to this time to know if there is any other civilised country in which the sons of the soil have been put under an inferior position to strangers or persons belonging to foreign countries. I think the question of the condition of the Indians in the Colonies can only be solved by our getting equal status in India. So long as we do not get equal status in India, we cannot possibly ask the Governments of Colonies to give us equal status with them in the Colonies and it is therefore useless sending our best men like the Right Honourable Mr. Sastri and spend so much money until we have been given equal status here in our own motherland. With these few remarks, I respectfully submit, whether I am doing a service or a disservice to the country, I cannot and I am not prepared to accept the Bill as it stands. Whether the old Criminal Procedure Code is worse or not, it is not proper for us to tolerate any further any racial distinctions giving preference to one community over another.

Dr. H. S. Gour (Nagpur Division: Non-Muhammadian): Sir, as a humble Member of the Racial Distinctions Committee, I acknowledge the compliments paid to that body and to the work done by it. In their speeches Honourable Members have however forgotten that the Bill as presented to this House is not the Bill as recommended by the Joint Committee and I think I must advert for a moment to the vital changes made in the Bill not only not in consonance with the tenor of the recommendations of the Joint Committee but directly opposed to their explicit and express recommendation. We decided that, so far as Colonials were concerned, there was no reason to include them in the definition of European British subject. We further decided that except as regards people who were employed in the Army and Navy, there was no reason why others should be equally exempt or at any rate equally exempt under the Code of Criminal Procedure generally applicable to the people of this country. We further decided certain other matters regarding summons cases and the right of appeal. I do not wish to refer to these last points, because they will conveniently come up under discussion in the course of the amendments of which Honourable Members have given notice. But there is, Sir, one point upon which we feel and feel strongly, and that is the interference of His Majesty's Government with the unanimous recommendations of the Joint Committee. It has been assumed by the Honourable Sir Campbell Rhodes and by my friend, Sir Henry Stanyon, and others speaking on behalf of the European community in this country that the Joint Committee appointed by the Government of India have given their wise and well-considered decision embodied in the Bill presented to this House. Implicitly, they condemn any extraneous interference with the unanimous recommendations of that Committee. I therefore take it, Sir, that I am voicing the general feelings of the Members of this House when I say that we protest respectfully, but nevertheless emphatically, against the interference of His Majesty's Government with the unanimous recommendations of the Racial Distinctions Committee; and if we accept the decision of His Majesty's Government, it is not because we wish to accept it, but because we feel, circumstanced as we are, that we must accept it. Our acceptance, Sir, is not willing acceptance, and I think this House should make it perfectly clear that it accepts it merely as an ad interim decision and reserves to itself the right of reconsidering it at a more favourable opportunity. Let us hope, in the near future. Sir, the Honourable the Home Member has pointed out that the feeling in this country against the Colonies is intense and strong. I for myself do not, Sir, recommend the exclusion of Colonials upon those narrow lines. I do so upon the broad principle that those who come here as travellers, as sojourners, as temporary residents, whether Europeans born and domiciled in the United Kingdom or in the British Colonies, may justifiably claim that they, being unacquainted with the laws here, are entitled to be judged by the British laws, or at any rate by the spirit of the British laws adapted to the conditions applicable to this country, and, so far as they are concerned, they are entitled to discriminating treatment; but I fail to understand why any European, whether a British subject or not, who has settled down permanently in this country and made this country his home should claim a right of ex-territoriality. I cannot understand, Sir, why he should say, 'I shall possess all the rights of a citizen of India and all the privileges of a foreign settler'. That, I submit, is the question which confronted us in the Joint Committee, and in my note I have laid emphasis upon this point, but when we found that a way was possible for the reconciliation of conflicting views, we came to terms and compromised in the manner indicated in our unanimous Report. This is my reply to my Honourable and learned friend, Mr. Bakshi Sohan Lal, whose speech I have listened to with great respect, but from whom I beg to differ on the main issue. It is perfectly true that the Joint Committee was appointed by His Excellency the Viceroy for the purpose of eliminating racial inequality. But it is at the same time equally true that this is a compromise arrived at by the representatives of both communities after long and arduous conferences and confabulations, and in which not only the Members of the Committee but outsiders were from time to time taken into counsel, and the Report of that Committee

does not embody merely what may be regarded as their individual views, but the considered opinion of the vast community outside whose representatives were examined and consulted upon these questions. My friend says, 'this is no solution of the difficulty, it is merely perpetuating a racial distinction which this Committee sat to eliminate'. But my friend must not look at every detail of the compromise: my friend as a lawyer must know that if you are to tear up a compromise into its individual fragments and examine each part piecemeal, these pieces would not be found satisfactory, but you must look at the compromise as a whole and see whether the compromise on the whole is not satisfactory to both sides. My friend, Sir Campbell Rhodes, has called this compromise a bitter pill to swallow. Well, Sir, whether it is a bitter pill for him to swallow or for us to swallow, I shall not ask my friend or myself to decide. Each party feels that the other party has had the plums of the bargain, but I think, Sir, whatever may be our differences and our views, the fact remains that both parties have entered into a compromise, and we expect Honourable Members in this House to support us. It may be that we might have got more, it may be that we have lost much more than we should have fought for, but now that the compromise has been arrived at, and that compromise is the foundation for this Bill, we expect, Sir, the support of the Members of this Assembly. The Honourable the Home Member has further rightly pointed out that this compromise must not be regarded as sacrosanct: it is a compromise which would be the foundation for future consideration and further advancement of rights, and as Sir Henry Stanyon with his large judicial experience has told this House, let us examine this compromise, give it a trial, a fair trial, and if afterwards it is found to be weak and unworkable, we shall again re-shape it and re-adjust it so as to suit the changed conditions that may be found necessary in future. After all what do we gain and what do we lose by giving this compromise a fair trial? My friend, Mr. Bakshi Sohan Lal, says either we shall have what we want or nothing at all. I think the Honourable the Home Member has very rightly pointed out that this extreme view is not the view which commends itself to men of practical commonsense. It is not what we want but what we can get that you should strive for, and the question that we have not got all we wanted is, I submit, not the question that should detain this House. The main question with which we are confronted here is that this is a compromise; it has been cheerfully accepted by the very community which had been standing upon its privileges and tenaciously fighting for its rights during the last 40 years. That, I submit, is a great gain. That the vast European community in this country, conscious of their privileges and of their power, should have sat with us and through their spokesman consented to the modifications proposed in the manner stated in the Joint Committee's report is a matter, Sir, for congratulation and gratification. That at any rate shows that that community is prepared to surrender its power and privileges for the purpose of meeting the people of this country half way. That, I submit, is a happy augury of the future relations between the two great communities in this country. We know as well as they know that we cannot advance, be it politically or economically, without the co-operation and assistance of the British people. I therefore submit, Sir, that the fact that in a matter of this vital national importance the European community in India have voluntarily offered to co-operate with us is a matter for deep gratification. That is a question which my friends who think otherwise should consider for a moment. It is not a question of abstract principles or abstract justice. It is a question, as I have said, of how the two communities can maintain and even advance those friendly relations which have been created by the two communities sitting together, the one surrendering its rights in favour of the other. That I submit is a question which should not be lost sight of in considering this question; it is the underlying principle of this Racial Distinctions Bill.

Now, Sir, reference has been made both by the Honourable the Home Member and my friend, Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary, to my motion for the reference of this Bill to a Select Committee. In tabling that motion I was actuated by a desire to shorten the career of this Bill in its passage through this House. I thought that if we were to sit in a Select Committee, formally or informally constituted, and discuss the numerous amendments of which notice has been given by Honourable Members, we might be able to make more rapid progress. My intention never was and it certainly is not even now to delay by a single moment the speedy disposal of this measure. Now that I feel that the sense of this House is against the reference of this Bill to a Select Committee, I shall be very pleased, Sir, to withdraw my motion. I am very glad that the Honourable Members will be here to decide the several amendments for themselves without giving the Select Committee the trouble of going through them. But before I sit down I once more appeal to my Honourable friends to rally to our support in passing this measure without unnecessary and undue reference to the past. I deprecate, Sir, reference to any controversy of 1882 or of 1883. I ask my friends to bury the hatchet, forget the past and think of the future. Let this be the starting point for an amicable arrangement for the working of the Code of Criminal Procedure, and let it be an augury of the future relations between the people of England and this country.

Mr. N. M. Samarth (Bombay: Nominated Non-Official): Sir, I rise to say just a few words on the subject matter of this Bill. In doing so, may I be permitted to congratulate the Honourable Leader of the House not only on his appearance in the House this morning, but on the weighty, felicitous and statesmanlike speech he made in moving the consideration of the Bill.

Honourable Members will remember that when I moved the Resolution of which this Bill has been the outcome, I appealed to European members to bear in mind the feelings, sentiments and prejudices of Indians in this matter; I appealed to my Indian colleagues also to bear in mind the feelings, sentiments and prejudices of Europeans in this matter. I made that appeal then because I was convinced that no solution which was one-sided was going to be an acceptable solution of the matter. A life of action, if it is to be useful, must be a life of compromise. And when people think badly and oddly of that word "compromise," they fail to ask themselves, what after all is life? Life itself is a compromise. You cannot advance a step unless you meet the conflicting forces around you and draw the resultant. The resultant itself is a compromise between two opposing forces and as such I hail with gratification the outcome of the Resolution which,—may I say?—I was made the humble instrument by a higher power to propose before the House. I thought that the day had come when the old spirit of hatred must give way, that with the Reforms a new era had dawned, that Englishmen and Indians who had fought in the trenches side by side as comrades were going under the new era to fight side by side, arm in arm, for the progress of this nation towards the goal of responsible Government; and I thought that in the new Assembly, there was the much needed opportunity to appeal to the best feelings and the better mind of England and the best feelings and the better mind of India, in order that we may strive and struggle together on this onward path on a footing of mutual good-will and understanding.

Well, Sir, there are one or two matters which I may be permitted to refer to. Of course, we, the members of the Racial Distinctions Committee, came to a unanimous conclusion so far as the exclusion of colonials from the definition of "European British subjects" was concerned. But I may assure the Leader of the House that so far as I was concerned, no feelings of retaliation animated me. My point was and is that I am not prepared in India to give to any Colonial any better treatment than is accorded him in criminal trials and procedure in a Crown Colony like Ceylon. If a Colonial does not get in Ceylon any better treatment than a Singhalese in this matter, what right has he to get any better treatment in India? That was the ground upon which I urged the exclusion of Colonials, and not because I wanted to retaliate. I do not believe in retaliation, spite and hatred. But I am afraid that that aspect of the question has not been brought to the notice of the British Cabinet.

1 P.M. Well, rightly or wrongly the British Cabinet has decided now against us on this point and introduced this little amendment. I do not quarrel over it. After all, as I said, it is a trifling matter. It has been already pointed out that there are only a few people who will be affected by it, and at the same time surely we need not presume that any of them are going to be offenders. Therefore, as a matter of practical politics, we need not now quarrel over it.

There is another matter upon which also there has been a deviation from the unanimous recommendation of the Committee. But, that also is a matter which in practice will not be of much difficulty or will not entail any further disabilities. After all, we have provided that these men shall be triable at their option in warrant cases before Sessions Judges and all that is now proposed to be done is that in a particular case, the Commanding Officer will ask the man to be brought before the Sessions Judge. It has been said by Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar that this Committee has not provided against miscarriage of justice. That was the gravamen of the charge. I am afraid, Sir, he has failed to see that we did everything possible to provide against it by way of providing for appeals both on facts and law against both convictions and acquittals. And that is the only safeguard that was needed and we have provided for it. Sir, I do not wish to detain the House any more. I congratulate the Government on having brought forward this measure ultimately, and I trust that the House will, without any difficulty, pass it as it is.

Lieut.-Colonel H. A. J. Gidney (Nominated: Anglo-Indians): Sir, I rise to take part in this discussion as another humble member of the Racial Distinctions Committee and to make but a few generic remarks. I wholeheartedly associate myself with Sir Campbell Rhodes in the remarks he made deservedly eulogising about the labours of Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru and Sir William Vincent on this Committee whilst adding appreciation of their labours. I must not forget to mention the great part that was played, at a very critical moment, by Mr. Justice Shah, another valued member of the Committee. Sir, when I attended the early sittings of this Committee, the old saying, possumus non-possumus, came prominently to my mind. I thought at first it was impossible that there could ever be an amicable decision on the grave issues at stake, but, after a few days, I could see that it was possible; and the ultimate decision of compromise which we agreed upon was the outcome of a mutual feeling of friendship and a development of trust between both the communities—to such an extent that in a very little while a compromising spirit of give and take pervaded the whole of the atmosphere of our deliberations. Although I subscribed myself to a very minor minute of dissent, yet, Sir, after hearing what other Members, both European and Indian, have said here to-day and the eloquent speech of the Honourable the Leader of the House, Sir Malcolm Hailey, I, for one, representing as I do the domiciled community, am sure, nay, I am convinced, that I have every reason to re-echo what Sir Henry Stanyon has just said, namely, that the time is not far distant when there will be no more need for the existence of a Racial Distinctions Bill,—that both Indians and Europeans and the other communities in this country will work hand in hand as equals,—that justice will be administered and will be accepted in its administration,—as Sir Henry Stanyon put it, irrespective of caste, creed and colour. Sir, the pitfalls and difficulties which confronted us at this Racial Distinctions Committee were multiform. At times we found that we had come to an impasse, but it was the skilful leadership of Sir Tej Bahadur Sapru and the tact and strategy of Sir William Vincent that turned this position to one of mutual understanding with the result that we have brought before this House this Bill,—a compromise which I feel sure every community in India will accept with pleasure and satisfaction as a decided advance in equality of status. I compliment the Government on the production of this Bill, I compliment the House on the statesmanlike way in which it is accepting it and I am sure the House will pass it without any dissentient voice whatever. As my Honourable friend, Mr. Rangachariar, said the other day “After all it is the first step that counts” and I am sure we will take this first step with such confidence, that our succeeding steps will guide us towards a better understanding—towards a better and truer realisation of that reciprocal feeling of trust between the various communities which India needs and must possess in her endeavours to develop a nation out of the heterogeneous classes that inhabit this country. With these few remarks, Sir, I associate myself wholeheartedly with all that my friend, Sir Campbell Rhodes, has said.

Mr. Pyari Lal (Meerut Division: Non-Muhammadan Rural): Sir, I feel to-day that Members of this House have formed themselves into a mutual adulation Society. There are my Indian friends who are congratulating the Europeans for the concessions the latter have made; and there are my European friends who are also thankful for the spirit that the Indians have displayed in approaching this question; and, I think we are in this sense, a very happy family. I congratulate the Government in bringing about this state of things. Sir, to me this question of abolishing distinctions between Europeans and Indians, is a question of practical politics. We, the Indians, should on our part realise our position; how we stand in respect to Europeans; and the Europeans also must realise their present position, and let alone things which happened 150 or 200 years ago. We have now advanced a great deal in their direction and are coming nearer and nearer to them in more matters than one; esteem and confidence should be mutual. The Europeans should be prepared to accept in India the same treatment that we Indians are receiving at the hands of Government. To me, Sir, as Dr. Gour put it, it is not what we wish to get, but what we can get, and it is a source of gratification to us that the Europeans have conceded in this matter what they have done, in dragging us up to their level rather than dragging themselves down to our level. As Bakshi Sohan Lal put it, the distinction still remains and will remain for many years to come. But the point is whether we are any better to-day than what we were yesterday and I decidedly think we are better. Although it may be a case of 'small mercies,' still we have to thank Government for them and our European friends also.

Dr. Nand Lal (West Punjab: Non-Muhammadian): Sir, if the interference with the recommendation of the Committee is due to the sincere desire that our relations with those who are in Colonies may become better, then, I, speaking for myself, welcome that idea. This is an epoch-making day in that the racial distinction which has been in existence seems to be buried for ever. But I may offer a suggestion to Colonies that they may not consider that this is our weakness and therefore we welcome it. It is simply on account of our sincere desire that we may prove our loyalty to the desire which has emanated from England. They must remember and bear in mind that we are laying claim to our equality and they will be pleased to appreciate this claim. Sir, I shall be failing in my duty if I do not also offer a suggestion to the Jury and to the Judges and that is this, that their task has become much more responsible by this Bill, and therefore they should see that justice is done and nothing of racial distinction is allowed to remain. With these few remarks, Sir, I heartily support the motion.

Rai Bahadur S. N. Singh (Bihar and Orissa: Nominated Official): I request, Sir, that the question may now be put.

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: The question is:

"That the Bill further to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, 1898, the European Vagrancy Act, 1874, the Indian Limitation Act, 1908, and the Central Provinces Courts Act, 1917, in order to provide for the removal of certain existing discriminations between European British subjects and Indians in criminal trials and proceedings, be taken into consideration."

The motion was adopted.

The Assembly then adjourned for Lunch till Fifteen Minutes Past Two of the Clock.

The Assembly re-assembled after Lunch at Fifteen Minutes Past Two of the Clock. Mr. President was in the Chair.

Mr. President: I think it may simplify the proceedings this afternoon if I refer to one or two amendments which raise questions of order. Amendment No. 2, standing in the name of Bakshi Sohan Lal, is out of order as it attempts to bring in an Act which is not proposed to be amended by the original Bill, and that ruling carries with it the exclusion of amendment No. 78. Similarly, amendments Nos. 16, 18, 86 and 89, in view of the manner in which the title and preamble of the Bill are drawn, bring in matters which are not in order.

The amendment standing in the name of Mr. Venkatapatiraju will only be in order if he excludes the two words "political or". The word "political" raises wide issues which are not contemplated in the present measure.

Then, as for amendment No. 21 standing in the name of Bakshi Sohan Lal, I am not quite sure what the Honourable Member's intention is. I shall deal with it, when we come to it.

Bakshi Sohan Lal, amendment No. 3.

Rai Bahadur Bakshi Sohan Lal: Sir, my amendment has two effects. The first is that this clause deals with the definition of European British subject, and, I submit, Sir, that Judges or Magistrates ought not to be influenced by the personality of the accused. Thus there is no necessity for keeping the definition of European British subject in the Criminal Procedure Code. We have got no definition of Indian British subjects. We have got no definition of a European or of an Indian, and there is no reason why we should have the definition of a European British subject.

Mr. President: Which amendment is the Honourable Member moving?

Rai Bahadur Bakshi Sohan Lal: Amendment No. 3. I move:

"That in clause 2 (1) substitute the word 'omit' for the word 'for' and omit all the words following the words and figures 'clause (1)'."

This will place all subjects of His Majesty in India on the same footing. Secondly, why should we influence the mind of the Judge or the Magistrate by the fact that a party is a European British subject or an Indian British subject, or whether he is a foreigner, a Parsi, or anything else? We should do away with this definition altogether and keep the mind of the Magistrate quite clean as if he knew nothing who was before him and treated wealthy and poor, King and subject of the King, on the same footing. That is the object of this amendment and, if it is also the view of the House that the Courts of Justice in this country should be free from any such bias, they ought to remove this definition. There is no reason why a European British subject should be defined in a law relating to the procedure of Courts of Justice in India. So I move that this amendment be passed.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Bakshi Sohan Lal of course harks back to his own Bill, forgetting all that has happened in the interval; but I think that the sense of the House this morning was that we can take no such radical views; the Committee has produced a compromise, and the general sense of the House and I believe of the country is that that compromise should be accepted. I do not, therefore, argue his proposition on its merits. I only remark this. This amendment excludes a definition. If he does so, then the rest of the Bill must fall to the ground. We could not provide for exceptional procedure in cases involving racial considerations without that definition. I am content to leave the matter at that; it is hardly necessary to make the further point that, if this definition goes out, then we shall need a fresh approval of the Secretary of State under section 65 of the Government of India Act.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri (Central Provinces Hindi Divisions: Non-Muhammadan): Sir, I move:

"That in clause 2 (1) in the proposed definition of 'European British subject' omit the words 'or any Colony'."

Sir, from the time when this Bill was introduced up to the present moment we have been asked to accept the Bill in its present form on the basis of the compromise arrived at between the representatives of the different communities in this country. We now find that this is a clause which goes even beyond that. In this definition, His Majesty's Government have not accepted that very compromise on which we are asked to accept this Bill. This is the definition on which there has been a sort of veiled threat of disallowance of the whole Bill if the Indian Legislature insisted on doing away with the privilege that is being accorded to the Colonials in this Bill. Sir, I do not know how we should act on that veiled threat. I thought that the moment the rights of legislation had been given to us and along with it the rights of vetoing had been reserved for the higher authorities, there was no need of giving approval or disapproval or any sort of veiled threat before the Bill had been passed by us. As Sir Malcolm Hailey has found from the attitude of this House, they are prepared to accept the compromise, and it was a needless fear on the part of His Majesty's Government to have thought that the Legislature would not act on the compromise, or that the whole Bill would be dangerous or capable of mischief without the inclusion of Colonials in this definition. I think the Secretary of State or His Majesty's Government should have left it to the good sense and as is always apparent the sweet reasonableness of the Indian Legislature to accept the compromise and to allow any definition that may have been put in the Bill. If His Majesty's Government or the Secretary of State thought that there was any danger or that any provision in the Bill was capable of mischief, they were perfectly at liberty under the powers vested in them to disallow subsequently that portion which they thought to be improper. Sir, apart from that, let us see what will be the effect of the inclusion of the Colonials in this definition of European British subject. We are giving certain rights and privileges to this special body of persons and which rights and privileges we disallow to other Europeans and other Members of the civilised nations. We are giving certain rights and privileges to a certain class of Colonials while we deprive other Colonials of those rights and privileges which they had enjoyed before. Sir, we are giving certain rights and privileges to Colonials which will be resented not only by the Members of this House but also by the whole of the Indian community at large, because of the treatment that has been accorded to our fellow brethren living in those Colonies. I do concede, Sir, that so far as rights and privileges and concessions in criminal trials in those countries are concerned, we have the same rights and privileges in their country as they have got in ours, and we are prepared to give the same rights and privileges which we have ourselves got to those gentlemen who come from those Colonies to this country. But I am not prepared to give those gentlemen any rights or privileges superior to those which we ourselves enjoy in this country. For instance, the Indians in this country are subject to the jurisdiction of even second and third class Magistrates. Why should the Colonials be taken away from that jurisdiction? Why should they not submit themselves to the same jurisdiction which we Indians submit ourselves to? Here, if they have to submit to the jurisdiction of second and third class Magistrates, they will be on terms of equality with us, but the moment we put ourselves under the jurisdiction of those Magistrates and take out these Colonials out of this jurisdiction, we give them something more which we ourselves do not enjoy. Under these circumstances, Sir, I think it is not proper to give these rights to these gentlemen. It is contended that probably it might be treated as a sort of reprisal and we may have to suffer certain other indignities and certain other bad treatment in their own country.

I do not believe, Sir, that it would be a reprisal if we give them the same rights which we ourselves enjoy. We give them the same rights that the highest in our country enjoys. We are prepared to give them the same rights which Americans and other European nations enjoy, and I do not think why we should give them superior rights. Sir, as for reprisal, I do not believe that any such will be the case; moreover if we are afraid of any reprisals from the Colonies owing to our taking away certain rights which we give to the European British subjects in this country, we should then also be afraid of reprisals from nations or countries other than the Colonials. For instance, America, or any other country. Further, Sir, it was said when the Bill was introduced and was moved for consideration that there were certain privileges which should not be withdrawn. I do not know why this definition of European British subject is to-day being put on the Statute Book. Under the old definition there were certain other people in the Colonies who enjoyed these rights. Why should they not enjoy it now? For instance, we may give a right to a Ceylonese to-day. But if the Ceylonese were to migrate to any other Colony, say South Africa, then two or three generations afterwards, his issue may not have the same rights which we may extend to him under the present definition in this Bill. For instance, his children or his grandsons or great grandsons or people of his descent in the male line will not have the same privilege as the present day European brother Colonials' issues will enjoy. It is quite incomprehensible to me on what ground this differentiation has been made. Moreover, there is another danger by giving this superior right to Colonials. The Colonials who do not like to give us equal rights in their own country will say "in your own country, by your own legislation, you recognise our superiority. How do you then claim equality in our country in other matters?" That will be giving them a weapon, an excuse, for putting us further down and heaping indignities and humiliations on the shoulders of our fellow-brethren. Sir, I could very well understand that those Colonials who have come to this country under the orders of His Majesty's Government or as servants of the Army and Navy may be given the same rights as the European British subjects and I would have conceded so far because they do not come to this country of their own choice. But why should those persons who have submitted themselves to our jurisdiction of their own choice, who have become permanent residents of this country of their own choice, have these privileges extended to them? With these words, Sir, I move that the words "or any Colony" be deleted from the definition of "European British subject."

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar (Madras City: Non-Muhammadan Urban): Sir, I was at first inclined myself to quarrel with the view taken by the Secretary of State in respect of this position, given to the Colonials but on reflection I thought it would be better that this country, uncivilised as it may be considered to be by these barbarians elsewhere might at least teach them a lesson, teach them a lesson in magnanimity, teach them a lesson that we can rise above passions and prejudices and if not thereby correct those people, at least enlist the sympathy and support of our European friends in this country and in Britain in all our legitimate fights which we are putting up in other directions in the colonies. Sir, if it were for the first time that an attempt was being made in this Legislature to include in the definition of European British subject the Colonial, we should have hesitated twice and thrice before we accepted such an inclusion. But we have to remember that the definition as it exists includes the Colonial, and therefore it is a question of taking away what exists in the Statute, not of what we are creating for the first time. That is one of the circumstances which weighed with me in this connection.

In the next place, as I have pointed out in my separate minute, if there is any reason at all for maintaining a distinction in favour of any class of people, that reason applies to the case of all people who are aliens in this country. I should advocate a distinction in favour of the Afghan, in favour of the Chinese, in favour of the Japanese, because there is as much justice in maintaining a distinction in favour of these people as there is in favour of European British subjects, because after all the whole thing turns upon whether they get fair justice or not in our courts, and these people are in a strange land and it must be admitted that as regards us, Indians, we do not distinguish an Englishman from a Colonial. I mean they are all alike to us. They do not associate with us as freely as they ought to do, and I do not know that we are able to make out the nationality of many of the members of the Civil Service present in this Hall itself. It is only for the first time I learn that the first Member of Council in Madras is a Colonial. It was for the first time I learnt on reading the report of the Local Government that the Governor in one of the provinces is a Colonial. I mean that that idea never crosses our minds. They are all whites to us: just as we are blacks to them, they are whites to us. But I daresay we are making a move to-day to abolish this colour distinction and I hope this will be a successful move. (Hear, hear) Sir, it is quite true that very many people advocate that these strokes of retaliation should take place, but let us remember that our nature and our religion in this country forbid retaliation. We are always required to forgive, and in fact even in the case of the extremist politician in this country, the non-co-operators—what is his weapon? It is not anger, it is love (Laughter); and I have no doubt they will appreciate magnanimity on our part: the non-co-operators in this country, I am sure will appreciate the magnanimous spirit in which we are doing our work to-day, because, as I stated already, it is our main object to teach these people a lesson. Again, there are Colonies and Colonies. That also we have to remember. It is not all Colonies which misbehave. There are some Colonies like Mauritius, where equal rights are accorded. There is no distinction at all either in the political franchise, or the municipal franchise; no disabilities in acquiring land, no disabilities in owning property. But there are Colonies which impose the poll tax. I was pained to hear the other day that Indian labourers in Fiji have to pay a poll tax. Of course they say they do it to all alike, but the Indians come in for the largest share; and I hope, Sir, that when such treatment is brought to the notice of our European colleagues, our European fellow subjects in this country, they will agitate more strongly than we can do in these matters. Their agitation will be more effective. An appeal from our European fellow-subjects in this land to their brethren in those Colonies will have a greater effect. Sir, in order to attain that end, with great reluctance I oppose this motion made by my friend, Mr. Agnihotri. I think he will on the whole be acting wisely in accepting this suggestion which has been made by Government. Let us not mar the passage of this measure by insisting upon this matter. I appeal to my Honourable friend, Mr. Agnihotri, to follow the example of the great man of this country, Mr. Gandhi, and exercise forbearance for his part.

Dr. H. S. Gour: Sir, my friend, Mr. Rangachariar, has no doubt unwittingly committed two mistakes. The first one is that the present definition of European British subject does not take away anything from the present Statute Law. (Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: "I did not say that; I said the Colonial was there already.") He said that the word "Colonials" was there already and that consequently we are not giving them anything more than what exists in the present enactment. That is wrong. Under section 65 of the Government of India Act to which reference was made by the Honourable the Home Member European British subject is defined as any subject of His Majesty born in Europe or the children of such subjects; that is the sole definition which occurs in the Government of India Act. Now, let us turn to the definition in the Indian Code of Criminal Procedure. There we find, not as my friend Mr. Rangachariar has pointed out, a person of European descent or extraction born in any of the colonies. The definition is "any subject of Her Majesty born, naturalised or domiciled in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland or in any of the European, American or Australian colonies or possessions of Her Majesty or in the colony of New Zealand or in the colony of the Cape of Good Hope or Natal." The colonies are enumerated and as Honourable Members will see these are all self-governing colonies where people of the English race have settled down permanently. The definition now proposed by Government is a wide extension over the definitions contained in the Government of India Act and also in the Code of Criminal Procedure. I shall presently illustrate my meaning. The definition says, "domiciled in the British islands or in any colony." Honourable Members know there is such a thing as a Crown Colony, Ceylon and Kenya for instance. Under the present definition any person of British descent being a subject of His Majesty, born in Ceylon or Kenya would become ipso facto a European British subject which he would not have been under the definition in the Code of Criminal Procedure and the Government of India Act. In that sense and to that extent the definition is not a reproduction of the old definition contained in the two Statutes I have mentioned; and as my friend, Mr. Samarth pointed out the law at present is that a person of European descent or of British descent born in Ceylon is amenable to the general law applicable in Ceylon. In passing I may point out that the criminal law of Ceylon is almost a verbatim reproduction of the Indian Penal Code, and the Criminal Procedure Code there more or less follows the lines of the Criminal Procedure Code here. In the trial of cases in that country no distinction is made between a native-born subject of Ceylon and a person of British extraction born in Ceylon. Consequently, we introduce this anomaly, that if a person of British origin is born or domiciled in Ceylon he will be tried under the general law in Ceylon itself, whereas if he crosses the Straits and is tried anywhere on the Continent of India he will immediately claim exemption under the proposed definition on the ground that he was born in a colony of England. That is the distinction. As I have said the distinction is a vital one. We are extending the definition of a European British subject. Let us make no mistake about it.

The second point is this: my friend, Mr. Rangachariar, said: "Let us be magnanimous and out of a sheer spirit of magnanimity let us give to the colonial-born the same rights and privileges as are enjoyed by a natural-born British subject." I am not so sentimental as my friend sitting opposite to me. I am prepared to accept the definition drafted, not on the ground of any real, assumed or pretended magnanimity, but out of sheer helplessness. I have protested at the commencement; I protest again that this extension of the definition is not in consonance with our national sentiment, and if it was within our power we would tear it up. But the Honourable the Home Member has given us an ultimatum. This is the irreducible minimum which the British Cabinet or the Home Government insists and upon which the Government are prepared to proceed with this measure of legislation. If we whittle it down, if we alter it or suggest any alterations upon this vital principle, the progress of the Bill will be delayed and possibly the Bill itself defeated. Honourable Members know that we are now almost at the end of our term. Any further delay in the progress of this measure might jeopardise its final enactment during our life. Therefore I suggest that although we do not accept the principle and protest as have protested before against a decision which we consider to be an undue and unnecessary enlargement of the definition which exists at present on the Statute Book. But we have no alternative. We have to bow to the inevitable and say— "If this is all you can give us, we are prepared to take it, but I wish you will recognise that we are doing so under an emphatic protest. We are doing so because we fear that owing to some misapprehension on your part or those who have given you instructions, you have unduly and unnecessarily enlarged the definition of European British subject and brought within its compass people who never could have been brought under the existing definition." This is the position, Sir, and in view of what I have said I think the House must now decide whether it is in favour of threshing out this question upon its merits or accept what has been offered to us and say "let us hope at least that in the near future wisdom will dawn upon those who are responsible for the introduction of this measure and that they will rectify the errors into which we are being led by force of circumstances."

It is upon these grounds, Sir, that I have decided not to move the amendment worded in the same terms as those of the Honourable Mover of this amendment, and I request him to do what I have decided to do, namely, to withdraw the amendment.

Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhikary: Sir, there is no counter arguing with a downright sine qua non argument. At the same time, one must be quite clear with regard to what one is doing and can do in future. Dr. Gour has referred to section 65 (3) as containing a definition of European British subject. Well, my reading of that sub-section is not Dr. Gour's reading. Let us see what section 65 (3) of the Government of India says:

"The Indian Legislature has not power, without the previous approval of the Secretary of State in Council, to make any law empowering any Court, other than a High Court, to sentence to the punishment of death any of His Majesty's subjects born in Europe or the children of such subjects, of abolishing any High Court."

I would not have taken up the time of the Assembly by reading that clause merely to combat Dr. Gour's point of view if I had not another object in view. In the Statement of Objects and Reasons, we have this sentence:

"His Majesty's Government are particularly interested in the Imperial aspect of the proposal, and they consider that the proposal of the Committee would raise an invidious and controversial question throughout the Empire. The Secretary of State for India in Council whose specific approval was required under section 65 (3) of the Government of India Act for certain provisions of the Bill has accordingly only accorded his sanction on the understanding that the definition proposed in the Bill will be accepted. On the other hand, it is recognised that the Committee have indicated clear grounds"

And so on. What I was not at all clear about when the Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey was speaking this morning and I am still less clear now, was with regard to how far section 65(8) of the Government of India Act comes in so far as the question of Colonials on its merits goes. Is the position this, that, under section 65(3) of the Act, the Secretary of State has certain powers of withholding sanction because of the question as to whether a Sessions Judge should have the right of sentencing a European British subject to death or not? That is the whip hand; availing himself of that, he imposes other conditions. We ought to clearly understand the situation, and, if the condition he imposes is a sine qua non, we are, as Dr. Gour says, helpless and have to submit. If the condition is on any other ground, matters would stand on a different footing altogether. We are pleased and thankful to learn that His Majesty's Government is particularly interested in the Imperial aspect of the proposal and that they consider that the proposal of the Committee would raise an invidious and controversial question throughout the Empire. When we appeal to the Imperial Government in regard to other matters in the colonies in respect of their Imperial aspect and object to invidious distinction, they say: "The colonies have their own laws: how can the Imperial Government interfere with them?" That is the point where the difficulty comes in. I recognise, Sir, that it is absolutely no good now at all events, going into the matter in the way the Mover of the amendment proposes but we want to have the matter quite cleared up when Sir Malcolm Hailey is replying so that we may know how far this Assembly or its successor would be prepared to go in deleting the word in question or corroborating them later on after the colonies show responsiveness. Now is not the time.

Colonel Sir Henry Stanyon: Sir, I have a very few words to say on this matter, but I should be glad indeed if I could take away from the House any impression that we are being dragged as it were at the wheel of the Secretary of State. I agree with the dignified pronouncement of my friend, Mr. Rangachariar, on this point; and I venture to differ with great respect from the interpretation put upon the proposed definition of an European British subject by my learned friend, Dr. Gour. It seems to me that he has missed the most essential words in that definition. He tells us that a Sinhadesi will be an European British subject under this definition. The important words here are "any subject of His Majesty of European descent." That for which the consideration of this House is asked by way of this definition, and other parts of this Bill, is the continuance of a form of privilege: if it be called a privilege—a technical form of trial—is what I prefer to call it—to which His Majesty's subjects of European descent have been accustomed for centuries. It is not a matter so much of domicile as a matter of descent. This definition does not enlarge unduly the former definition of a "European British subject." It makes it far more correct. Under the existing definition now in the Criminal Procedure Code, a Maori, a Hottentot, or a Red Indian in Canada would be an European British subject. Under the definition now proposed, only a subject of European descent in the male line, born, naturalised, or domiciled in the British Islands or in any Colony would be an European British subject. Dr. Gour referred to certain colonies which are specifically mentioned in the Code of 1898. The alteration now proposed merely moves with the times. We have had a big war since that Code was enacted and the colonies have expanded. If we were to include in a list all the present colonies of Great Britain by name, we should have a very cumbrous section and I do not know that we should gain any advantage. The consideration by way of compromise of this House is asked in favour of British subjects of the European race wherever they are. Let the spirit of compromise be extended towards the race, without reference to the place where the subjects of this race may live. I contend that we are not accepting the proposed definition because we have no alternative. Our position is, I think, much more dignified. If we choose to do so, we can throw out the definition. Indeed we can throw out the whole Bill, we have power to do so. We are by no means slavishly dragged into this legislation. But it is put to us that one body whose opinion at all events, we are bound to respect, namely, His Majesty's Government, think that persons of European race wherever they may be, ought to have the same privileges, and to be included in this definition; and I agree with Mr. Rangachariar that it will be the more dignified and more magnanimous course, and set a proper example to those European subjects who take a wrong view of the rights of Indians in other places, for us, to accept this claim—not in a spirit of churlishness, but in a spirit of dignity.

Mr. Jamnadas Dwarkadas (Bombay City: Non-Muhammadan Urban):

3 P.M.

I am afraid, Sir, that the position both as placed by my Honourable friend, Mr. Rangachariar, and also as placed by my Honourable friend, Dr. Gour, was such as is not acceptable at any rate to me. I look at the question entirely from the practical point of view and I am glad to find that my Honourable friend, Sir Henry Stanyon, has to a certain extent made that position clear. What is the position? The position is this that His Majesty's Government want the inclusion of Colonials in the definition of European British subject. Now, I have not been slow to protest against the continual interference of His Majesty's Secretary of State in matters in which he is ignorant, in matters upon which the Government of India and the Indian Legislature as at present constituted are more competent to decide than the Secretary of State himself, but I do feel on deep reflection, that this is a matter on which His Majesty's Government can legitimately have some say, that the point of view of the colonies can be appreciated more by His Majesty's Government than all those of us, the Government of India as well as ourselves, who feel keenly on the question of the treatment of our own countrymen and countrywomen in the colonies. Now, naturally, the exclusion of colonials from the definition of European British subjects would have caused embarrassment to His Majesty's Government. If His Majesty's Government had acquiesced in accepting that privilege for British subjects which they were not prepared to extend to their subjects in the Colonies, it would have made their position at any rate awkward vis-à-vis the colonies. What then should be our position? What then are we called upon to do? Are we prepared or not to draw His Majesty's Government out of that position of embarrassment in which they would be rightly placed if they took that for Britishers which they were not prepared to offer to colonials, and I say speaking as a practical man that we would be doing well in helping His Majesty's Government in being drawn out of that state of embarrassment. For this reason, we shall have an argument in our favour when we shall have to call upon the assistance and the support of His Majesty's Government in putting forward our claims in regard to our own countrymen and countrywomen in the colonies. This is a matter on which if we acted wisely, appreciated the difficulties of His Majesty's Government and not through a position of sheer helplessness which my Honourable friend, Dr. Gour, has depicted, but through a position of the correct understanding of the legitimate and real difficulties of His Majesty's Government if we assisted His Majesty's Government in being drawn out of that awkward situation, we, I think, will have the right to make capital of the support thus given, in insisting upon His Majesty's Government supporting us in our demand for according better treatment to our own countrymen and countrywomen in the Colonies. As Sir Malcolm Hailey has pointed out, an obstinate attitude on this question might satisfy our pride to a certain extent that we have dealt a blow at the Colonies by retaliating. But it would be a childish and false pride indeed. That blow is bound to be ineffective. The Colonies are not likely to feel that blow, and we might be able perhaps to create more bad blood in the Colonies. If instead of that, if, instead of making an obstinate effort at rendering an ineffective blow on a matter which is not really pertinent to our political position in the Colonies, if we at this moment supported His Majesty's Government, we should then have the right of claiming the support of His Majesty's Government in getting better treatment accorded to our own countrymen and countrywomen in the Colonies. It is because I think our attitude on this question would be a capital, would be an investment for the future, that I support the attitude taken up by His Majesty's Government.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: The amendment under discussion involves questions both of detail and of principle; and I may be pardoned if I deal first with the questions of detail that have been raised, for it is necessary to do so, since some of the suggestions made to the House were to my mind misleading. Mr. Agnihotri told us that he saw no reason why when this Legislature had been given its powers, the Secretary of State or the Home Government should not be content to rely on their powers of veto. He suggested that if any clause of the Bill as passed by us was unsatisfactory to the Home Government, they could veto that clause. But as has appeared from the discussions this afternoon, we have to reckon with section 65 of the Government of India Act under which the specific approval of the Secretary of State to certain sections of this Bill would in any case be necessary. It would not therefore have been possible for the Home Government to rely purely on the power of veto. Nor indeed would it have been possible for His Majesty's Government to veto, as Mr. Agnihotri suggested, a single section of the Bill. If the Bill contained sections which they could not accept, they would have been obliged to disallow the whole. Mr. Agnihotri, again, compared his own position in moving this amendment to that of the Committee, which, he said, recommended that the status at present enjoyed by Dominion subjects should be taken away from them. But here he is wrong; his position is not that of the Committee, for it will be realized that while the Committee, both the majority and the minority, considered that some protection should be given to Colonial Members of His Majesty's forces serving in India, Mr. Agnihotri's amendment would withdraw even that amount of protection. Again, he drew a comparison between Colonials and Americans; he suggested that we should give the Colonials the same rights as Americans. Now of course his amendment would not do that. It will be admitted everywhere, I think, that when we have certain Treaties which force us to give to certain nations, six in number, the rights at present enjoyed under section 400, we cannot deny those rights to Americans generally. It would be impossible, for instance, to give rights to citizens of Costa Rica or Venezuela which were denied to citizens of the United States; I am sure I need not argue the point to this Assembly. But, if we have to give rights to Americans equivalent to rights now enjoyed under section 400, then Mr. Agnihotri's amendment would have the effect of giving Colonials far less than those rights. It would give them nothing at all. It would give them less than Indians, for Indians at all events under our

[Sir Malcolm Hailey.]

Bill will be able to claim a majority on a jury, and under Mr. Agnihotri's amendments Colonials would not be able to claim even that much. So that his amendment, so far from giving them, as he thinks, it would, the rights enjoyed by Americans, would give them far less than those rights and would give them far less rights than Indians themselves. Obviously, therefore, there is something wrong, even in the manner in which he proposes to carry out his own proposals. He finished by saying that if Colonials can feel that they have succeeded in extorting this privilege from us, they will use that as an argument for further maltreating the Indians in the Dominions. But would it be correct to say that they have succeeded in extorting this privilege from us? They have had this privilege since 1872. It has been maintained at the express desire of His Majesty's Government. There is no question of extortion by Colonials at all.

Then, Sir, Dr. Gour objected that our definition involved a very considerable extension of rights to Colonial subjects. I do not intend to deal with that point at length, since Dr. Gour (though for reasons other than those which commend themselves to us) has agreed to withdraw his amendment on the subject. But I think it is well to point out again the steps by which we have proceeded to our present amendment; he was corrected on that point both by Sir Deyo Prasad Sarbadhikary and by Sir Henry Stanyon. We of course have merely endeavoured to get one comprehensive expression which will do away with the geographical inexactitude, if nothing else, of the present definition in the Criminal Procedure Code. That, and nothing else, was our intention in adding the words "or any Colony"; this being the phrase used in the General Clauses Act. We wanted one comprehensive term which would carry out the obvious intention of the original section, which was, as Sir Henry Stanyon very rightly said, to give to people of the British race wherever domiciled the privileges we are now discussing. But Dr. Gour has I think forgotten that though the exact effect of our present definition may be to give this protection to residents of Crown Colonies, when they happen to be in India and might therefore appear to involve an extension, since the existing definition refers only to the Dominions yet on the other hand it involves a very considerable restriction. I need not refer to what Mr. Rangachariar himself said in his minute and the Committee has also said in the course of its report, in regard to the exceeding undesirableness of our present definition. It was an absurdity that certain persons entirely of non-British and non-European ancestry living in the Colonies should on visiting India receive these exceptional rights; and we have revised our definition by the addition of the words "of European extraction" for the purpose of excluding those persons. So that, while on the one hand it may seem that we have opened the privileges to persons residing in Crown Colonies as well as the Dominions, yet on the other hand the effect of our definition will in point of practice be a wide and logical exclusion of privileges in regard to persons for whom those privileges were never intended. I can not accept what Dr. Gour says about Ceylon. He says that while a European living in Ceylon is subject to a law which is in every way equivalent to the Criminal Procedure Code, yet when he comes to India he would enjoy the exceptional procedure provided in the Bill. The Ceylon Code is not, I think, in every way equivalent to the Criminal Procedure Code. There are vital differences. You have there the Police Court with small powers, the District Court which could give imprisonment up to two years and all other cases have to go to the Supreme Court. Whatever the outward form of the law that constitutes a very vital difference between Indian and Ceylon Courts. But in the end, Dr. Gour accepts our position under protest and under a feeling of helplessness. Now, there are many other reasons—and some of them have this afternoon been adduced—why it is on the whole advisable to accept the position of this definition. As was very rightly pointed out, there is no compulsion in the matter. The only compulsion in the matter is—and here I address myself to the arguments of Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhiary—the only compulsion in the matter is that if you value the other features of the Bill, then it is undoubtedly necessary to accept this feature. There is no “ veiled threat ” as Mr. Agnihotri said; there is no threat at all. The matter is perfectly open. The Secretary of State under section 65 of the Government of India Act was obliged to give approval to certain features of the Bill. You may speak of it if you like, a bargain or as a condition; but it is certainly not a threat if in giving his assent the Secretary of State states that he does so purely on the condition that the new definition should maintain the privileges of the Dominion subjects. I quite agree with Sir Deva Prasad Sarvadhiary that section 65 does not refer to Colonial subjects unless they are born in Europe. But it is quite competent for the Secretary of State, acting under the orders of His Majesty, to attach that condition to his assent. Further I would not myself advise the House to accept the definition under any feeling of helplessness. I do not even advise it to accept the definition under that peculiar safeguard known to lawyers, I mean “ without prejudice ”. I discussed the question this morning and I think that Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar in his remarks somewhat misinterpreted what I said. I did not go so far as to pretend that if we waived our right to withdraw from Dominion subjects the status now enjoyed by them, we could put forward a claim to be treated with magnanimity by Dominion subjects. I saw myself that that was a somewhat dangerous argument, and I was afraid I should lay myself open to exactly the argument which Mr. Seshagiri Ayyar actually used, namely, that the Dominion subjects would have no respect for you unless you show your teeth. What I did say, and I hold to it, was that whatever might be the possible result of allowing the definition to stand, yet to legislate now and here for withdrawing from Dominion subjects the status now enjoyed by them would undoubtedly do no good. I am no prophet, I can not pretend to say whether the exhibition of magnanimity on our part will earn its reward or not. But what I could say is this. If you legislate in the sense that was recommended by the Committee, then it is certain that you will do active harm; that at all events seems to me a direct certainty. But, Sir, this fact does remain; you have somehow got to induce a better atmosphere in the Dominions. You can only secure what you want—I say what you want, but it is also what your Government wants,—you can only induce by promoting a better knowledge of yourselves and a better estimation of India. I believe if you were to legislate in the sense in which Mr. Agnihotri desires, you would go far towards destroying all chance of securing that atmosphere with the Dominions. More than that, as Mr. Jannadas pointed out—and I welcome his aid in this respect—you would perhaps lose your own claim on the assistance of the Home Government, for whatever value the Dominions may attach to the feelings and aspirations of India, remember that they will still more be influenced by what is said in England itself. If you can create in England itself an atmosphere favourable to you, you have taken an important step towards securing a better atmosphere in the Dominions also. I have argued the question purely on its merits. It is, as Mr. Jannadas said, a practical question. You have simply to balance the advantages, and I believe myself that the advantage lies, and lies clearly and distinctly in recognizing that Colonials, as Members of the British race, should retain the rights which they now enjoy.

Mr. B. Venkatapatiraju (Ganjam cum Vizagapatam: Non-Muhammaddan Rural): Sir, I do not rise here to show magnanimity as my friend, Mr. Rangachariar, or despair as Dr. Gour, or my view as a practical man, as Mr. Jaunnadas. I want to make an appeal to my friend Mr. Agnihotri not to press this amendment, because when he gives up the substance, why should he fight for the shadow? Is there any country in the world wherein outsiders can come in and say "you must have a special law and a special procedure for us?" Is it possible in any self-governing and self-respecting country to provide for such a thing in any Criminal Procedure Code? When you have accepted that, why should you fight about a few Colonials? No Colony so far as I am aware has any discriminatory legislation in the Criminal Procedure Code against Indians? On the other hand, I may tell you, there are some advantageous provisions in some Colonies. Whereas in Fiji the privilege of an European is to drink, while no Indian is allowed to drink, and no Indian is allowed to waste his time out of his house after nine, but only a European can. But these are only trifles and so long as there is that humiliating provision in the Bill discriminatory procedure for Europeans and Americans do not fight against the Colonials only. For these reasons I appeal to my friend not to press his amendment.

(Some Honourable Members: "The question may now be put.")

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, as advised by my friends, I have no alternative but to ask the permission of the House to withdraw this amendment. Let us have some experience of being practical men, and let us see how that will benefit us.

The amendment was, by leave of the Assembly, withdrawn.

Bhai Man Singh: Sir, the amendment which stands in my name is as follows:

"In clause 2 (1) (i) in the proposed definition of 'European British subject' after the word 'Colony' add the following words: 'The laws of which make no distinction between the status of Indians and Europeans'."

Of course, Sir, the legal phase of the question has been argued a good deal by my friends who have spoken on the previous amendment. I will only add that the definition of European British subject, as it at present stands in the Criminal Procedure Code, does not include many of the Colonies, against whose treatment Indians have to complain. Kenya is not included in the present definition nor is South Africa. For myself I cannot understand why the point should be pressed that we should give superior rights to the inhabitants of those Colonies which do not give us even the status of citizens. Sir, I may be called one who is very revengeful or one who is very retaliatory, but, if that is the fact, I am in very good company. Honourable Members must have read the replies from various bodies supplied to them. I would draw the attention of Honourable Members of this House to page 22 of those replies wherein we have got a letter from the Government of Bombay which runs as follows:

"In continuation of this Government letter No. 430, dated the 4th September 1922, I am directed by the Governor in Council to forward herewith a separate minute of dissent recorded by the Honourable Sir Ibrahim Rahimtoola, Kt., C.I.E., and the Honourable Dr. Sir Chimanlal Setalvad, Kt., LL.B., LL.D., Members of the Executive Council of the Governor of Bombay, on the proposals to amend the Criminal Procedure Code, 1896, based on the recommendations made by the Racial Distinctions Committee."

"We are of opinion that the subjects of those British Dominions and Colonies in which Indians are denied the rights of British citizens and equality of treatment should not have any privilege accorded to them in India. We desire that our view should be communicated to the Government of India."

Not only that, we have got another opinion of another eminent lawyer, the Additional Judicial Commissioner of Oudh, who says:

"I agree to the proposed change. I note that members of the overseas dominions are deprived of the right of European British subjects. But I consider this is quite fair in view of the attitude assumed towards Indians by these Governments. The question can be settled hereafter by negotiation between the Government of India and the Governments of the dominions."

Sir, it really pained me when I heard my Honourable friend Mr. Rangachariar preach to me this sermon of magnanimity and tells me that it is religion that makes it a duty of mine to be magnanimous. I do know that religion enjoins magnanimity, but at the same time, if Mr. Rangachariar wants to join issue with me, I will tell him from the Scriptures of nearly every religion from his own Gita, from the exact words of Shri Krishna that there are times when we have to retaliate. I really wonder that in the name of magnanimity we should do this. I say in the name of sheer self-respect, we should say "No, my dear Sirs, if the Colonies are not going to give us the status of citizens, for God's sake let us give them a superior status in India." Sir, the great point that has been made about these Colonials is the Imperial question. My Honourable friend Mr. Jammadas Dwarkadas very vehemently and strongly laid stress on the point that if we submit to the wishes of the Imperial Government . . .

Mr. Jammadas Dwarkadas : Not 'submit'; 'support'.

Bhai Man Singh: I think it is 'submit'; you think it is 'support'—if we support the views of the Home Government, we shall have a claim on them to help us in getting equal rights in those Colonies. I would request Mr. Jammadas Dwarkadas to consider whether we have not already got more than enough claims on the Home Government to support our claims in the Colonies. We have been crying out for years together to the Home Government to support us. What more is needed?

Mr. Jammadas Dwarkadas : Why not have one more weapon in our armoury?

Bhai Man Singh: I take the other side of the question. The Colonies have been treating us as they have for a long time but they find the Imperial Government still helping them and trying to give them a higher status in India than what the Indians even are given. Does not that show that the Imperial Government does not care for the maltreatment that has been accorded to the Indians up till now? They would be convinced that the Indians also submit to that. Therefore, we need not pay much attention to this argument. On the other hand, the Colonies would think that we have not got even the self-respect to fight for the honour of our own country. So we can say, "My dear Sir, at least if you are not going to give us equal rights in your country, we are not going to give you superior rights in our own country." Then, Sir, I cannot understand why the Secretary of State should interfere in such a matter on the side of the Colonies. Section 65 of the Government of India only lays down that the Indian Legislature has not power, without the previous approval of the Secretary of State in Council, to make any law empowering any Court other than the High Court to sentence to the punishment of death any of His Majesty's subjects born in Europe

Mr. President: Order, order. I cannot allow a repetition of the discussion on that point. The Honourable Member must confine himself to the terms of his amendment.

Bhai Man Singh: The point to which I wish to draw the attention of this House is that we should not take the position imposed upon us out of sheer helplessness. The utmost that the Secretary of State can do in the matter is to say, "All right. I do not allow this law to be passed to the extent that the Sessions Judge or any other Court below the status of a High Court can pass the sentence (of death)." I personally, Sir, would prefer not to give a superior status to a Colonial gentleman whose country does not give to our countrymen equal status, and I would prefer to have a law in the country that every European British subject should only be tried for offences

Mr. President: Order, order. The Honourable Member is getting a long way from the subject.

Bhai Man Singh: I am submitting, Sir, that even if the Secretary of State uses his powers under section 65 of the Government of India Act, still we should not mind it and we should carry this amendment. There are two alternatives before us. One is that the Secretary of State would disallow the law we pass to the extent that no Sessions Judge or no Court other than a High Court can pass any sentence of death. I would allow that discrimination in favour of the European British subject to remain to that extent, rather than give a Colonial, whose Government does not give equal status to the Indian, a superior status in my own country. That is my very clear position, Sir.

I think I am perfectly in order when I request the House to accept this alternative that is proposed in section 65 rather than accept this position which is highly incompatible with the self-respect of my countrymen. My Honourable friend Mr. Rangachariar in his speech said that there are colonies and colonies

Mr. President: The Honourable Member from Madras has not spoken on this amendment.

Bhai Man Singh: I am speaking on my amendment and I am drawing Mr. Rangachariar's attention to his speech so that he may support this amendment. There are colonies which give Indians equal status. For instance, there is Mauritius where Indians can buy lands and become members of the Legislature. I am saying this in order that my Honourable friend may support my amendment in pursuance of his utterance. I should say in conclusion that the change that has been made in the recommendations of the Racial Distinctions Committee is not really warranted by the opinions of a good many Indians and Local Governments. I know the Punjab Government, the Burma Government and Mr. Justice Stuart all agreed to the definition proposed by the Racial Distinctions Committee. Now, if we are going to accept any change, the change that has been proposed by the Secretary of State, we should only accept that change with the reservation that I have proposed in my amendment.

The amendment was negatived.

Rai Bahadur Bakshi Sohan Lal: The amendment which I propose is :

" In clause 2 for sub-clause (2) substitute the following :

' (2) In paragraph (j) of sub-section (1) of section 4 of the Code, omit the first 43 words '.

I respectfully submit even if this Assembly is powerless to remove all racial distinctions in the administration of criminal justice, why should not every High Court have the same power, why should the definition of a High Court for the purpose of European British subjects be different from that in the case of other subjects? I submit that one uniform definition should be quite enough to serve all the purposes we have in view. So the following definition should be enough :

" ' High Court ' means the highest Court of Criminal appeal or revision for any local area, or where no such Court is established under any law for the time being in force, such Officer as the Governor General in Council may appoint in this behalf."

In this Bill, the definition given in the Code has been retained with a few verbal changes. There is another thing. Why should some judicial Commissioners have been given the powers of a High Court, while others have not been?

I respectfully submit that the Judicial Commissioner of the North-West Frontier Province who exercises the highest powers of criminal appeal should also come within the definition which I propose to be adopted. I respectfully submit that we should not tamper with all the courts from the highest Court to the lowest Court, so far as the trial of European British subjects is concerned.

Mr. President: The question is :

" In clause 2, sub-clause (2) substitute the following :

' (2) In paragraph (j) of sub-section (1) of section 4 of the Code, omit the first 43 words '.

The motion was negatived.

Bhai Man Singh: I simply move : *

" That in clause (j) after the word ' Oudh ' the words ' North-West Frontier Province ' be inserted."

I do not wish to move the words " British Baluchistan " also. I would request the Honourable the Home Member to take into consideration if the Judicial Commissioner of the North-West Frontier Province is a sufficiently advanced court so as to be included in this section or not, and if he is not fit to be included in this list whether he will consider that he is a proper judicial court for the North-West Frontier Province.

The motion was negatived.

Clause 2 was added to the Bill.

Mr. B. Venkatapatiraju: My amendment is only a drafting amendment to clause 3. It runs :

" To clause 3 add the following :

' and in the marginal note to the same section for the words ' Justice of the Peace for the Mufassil ' the words ' Justice of the Peace for British India ' shall be substituted."

I may mention with your permission that there is a mistake in the whole drafting of clause 3. I appeal to the Government draftsman to find out the words mentioned therein in the Criminal Procedure Code. They do not really find a place in the Criminal Procedure Code itself, because in section 22 of the said Code the words and brackets ("other than the presidency towns") do not appear in the Code itself.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: To terminate this part of the discussion I may point out that the amendment is obviously due to a mistake, as the Mover will see if he refers to the amended copy of the Code. Section 22 has been altered by the amendment of 1920.

Clause 3 was added to the Bill.

Clause 4 was added to the Bill.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, I beg to move:

"That clause 5 be omitted."

Clause 5 of the Bill provides:

"Notwithstanding anything contained in section 28 or 29, no Magistrate of the second or third class shall inquire into or try any offence which is punishable otherwise than with fine not exceeding Rs. 50 where the accused is a European British subject who claims to be tried as such."

Sir, under sections 28 and 29 of the Criminal Procedure Code the Courts are specified which are to take cognizance of offences for trials and under section 29 a provision has been made that, subject to the provisions of section 447—which will come up later on in the Bill—"any offence under any other law shall, when any Court is mentioned in this behalf in such law, be tried by such Court. Further, when no Court is so mentioned, it may be tried by the High Court or by any Court constituted under this Code by which such offence is shown in the eighth column of the Second Schedule to be triable." By this clause 5 we are restricting the jurisdiction of certain Courts, over the trial of European British subjects; and those Courts whose jurisdiction we are restricting in respect of trials of European British subjects are the Courts of the Magistrates of the second class and the Magistrates of the third class. So far as I can judge or understand, the reason that may have influenced the authors of this Bill may have been the incompetency of such class of Magistrates to try an European British subject. I can not think of any other reason that may have been responsible for the taking away of the jurisdiction from such Magistrates. But to what I wish to draw the attention of the House is this, that whenever I spoke about the competency of such Magistrates while certain of the provisions of the Criminal Procedure Code were under discussion and wherein their powers have been increased, it was stated from the Government Benches that the Magistrates of the second class were quite competent to have an extension of jurisdiction over certain cases which were referred to in these sections of the Code. I do not understand how those Magistrates are now disqualified from trying European British subjects when they are qualified to try an Indian British subject of howsoever eminence he be. They would say, 'no, we are not taking away the jurisdiction of the second or third class Magistrates but we are simply restricting the jurisdiction in certain cases'. They say that a second or a third class Magistrate shall be competent to try an European British subject for an offence which is punishable with a fine not exceeding Rs. 50. I admit, Sir, that there are certain offences mentioned in laws other than the Penal Code which are punishable with a fine of Rs. 50 or less, but so far as I am aware, there is no offence defined in the Indian Penal Code (the chief penal law of India), excepting probably one of drunkenness under section 510 which is punishable with fine of Rs. 50 or less only. So, under this new clause 5 we practically take away the jurisdiction of these Magistrates over European British subjects for offences triable under the Penal Code. Sir, it has been claimed for this Bill and for the compromise which has been so much talked of, that no differentiation has been made between Magistrates with regard to the trial of cases in which European British subjects were involved; that is to say, that under this Bill every Magistrate shall have an equal jurisdiction over European and Indian British subjects. I beg to submit, however, that this clause of the Bill is contrary to this principle. Here you are taking away the rights of an Indian Magistrate of the second class who has been thought competent to try cases against Indians but who has on the other hand been thought to be incompetent to try cases involving Europeans. If they are really incompetent and unfit to try any cases, I do not then understand why they should be authorised to try Indian British subjects and put the liberties of such subjects in jeopardy. It is very incongruous that this differentiation in the jurisdiction of Magistrates should continue even in the present Bill. It is very desirable that this power be also extended to the second or third class Magistrates in the matter of trial of European British subjects and the Indian second and third class Magistrates be not led to believe that they are looked down upon by the Government whose interests they always serve and to whom they are always loyal and faithful may be sometimes even at the sacrifice of their conscience. I therefore submit that this withdrawal of jurisdiction so far as these Magistrates are concerned should not be perpetuated in this Bill and that the clause 5 be omitted.

Probably the Honourable the Home Member may say that there may be some difficulty if we were to do away with the whole clause, because by doing so we retain the words: "the provisions of section 447." But to that I would reply that there are other amendments tabled in the list of amendments which will remedy that defect even if this clause is omitted.

Mr. Muhammad Yamin Khan (Meerut Division: Muhammadan Rural): Undoubtedly, Sir, the Government is inconsistent in proposing this section to the Bill. When we had a discussion on the Police Disaffection Bill a lot of compliments were paid to the second and third class Magistrates. But apart from that, even if the Government is inconsistent, I do not see why this Assembly should be inconsistent. This Assembly in the Police Disaffection Bill passed the provision that these cases should not be tried by second and third class Magistrates but only by first class Magistrates. Adhering to that principle which the Assembly accepted after due consideration, I think Mr. Agnihotri who supported that amendment should now withdraw this amendment.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: It is perhaps a little difficult to know where we stand in point of consistency; Mr. Agnihotri himself may find it a little difficult to justify what he says now about second and third class Magistrates in the light of what he said in our late discussions on the Criminal Procedure Code. But if there is any inconsistency to-day, it is not I feel on the part of Government. We have framed the Bill on the lines of a compromise accepted by representatives of both communities. I am not called upon, I consider, to support on its merits the proposal that second and third class Magistrates should not try these cases; it is sufficient that

[Sir Malcolm Hailey.]

I should take my stand on what was accepted, as I have said, by the representatives of these two communities. I can look perhaps into their reasons; I have examined them, and they reflect two somewhat different views. Different reasons obviously appealed to different parties to the compromise. Doubtless Mr. Agnihotri has been thinking of the reasons which appealed to the European side, namely, that second and third class Magistrates as a rule know very little English, and are still more handicapped by their entire lack of knowledge of English ways of life and thought. Yet obviously, there were at the same time other considerations which appealed to the other party to the compromise. Let me read what some of them said. Here is an Indian witness from Nasik, a High Court Vakil. He says:

"I do not wish to disparage the second and third class Magistrates as a class. Nevertheless, I hold the view, which is based on practical experience and which I believe will be supported by many members of the legal profession, that these lower class Magistrates are lacking in that spirit of independence which will save them from being influenced by the consideration of securing the favour of their European superiors, in some cases by the very fact that the European nationality will be offended."

That perhaps, is an argument which might come as a surprise to Mr. Agnihotri, and yet on the other hand, it undoubtedly appealed to some members of the Committee. I have given that quotation as typical; I could multiply it if necessary. That, undoubtedly, is the general consideration which influenced Mr. Justice Shah in supporting the proposal of the Committee. His conclusion was:

"This is an exception to the general scheme of the recommendations, which appears to me unavoidable under the circumstances, and so far as I have been able to ascertain the Indian opinion on this point as reflected in the evidence before us it will not be objected to."

The conclusion come to by Mr. Rangachariar on the subject was:

"I quite recognise it will not be safe, from more points of views than one", . . .

I think we have now seen what those points of view are:

"to entrust the trial of European British subjects for serious offences in the hands of second and third class Magistrates."

I can do nothing better, I think, than leave Mr. Agnihotri in the hands of Mr. Rangachariar, and I have no doubt he will deal with him faithfully.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Sir, as a direct appeal has been made to me, I could not resist the temptation of dealing with it. Sir, in my province, we have got second class Magistrates who are very efficient people indeed. But the evidence led before the Committee was that in these provinces,—I was surprised to hear it indeed—that even first class Magistrates do not know a word of English and they render their judgments in the vernacular. There are, I understand, many in the Punjab. But to the credit of my province, almost all the second class Magistrates and some third class Magistrates also are graduates. Another fact which weighed with me in agreeing to this recommendation was this. My Honourable friend, Sir Malcolm Hailey, read one portion of my minute. If he had read the previous sentence also, my meaning would have been plainer. I say there:

"Having regard to the present conditions of recruitment to these Magistracies and to the combination of executive and judicial functions in the District authorities, I quite recognise it will not be safe, from more points of view than one, to entrust the trial of European British subjects for serious offences in their hands."

What passed in my mind I will say plainly. These people are not able to resist the temptation of unduly respecting the European. I mean

4 P.M. it has become a habit with them, and I have seen a Magistrate rise from his seat on the Bench when a European witness appeared before him and offer him a chair. Although the zemindar may appear a great man in the district, he does not do so for him. It was this weakness that I had in mind and it seemed to me a wholesome provision to avoid them. We want justice done, and we must have independence on the Bench. I think my Honourable friend, Mr. Agnihotri, will recognise that shortcoming with these Magistrates.

Khan Bahadur Zahiruddin Ahmed (Dacca Division: Muhammadan Rural): I will say one word and one word only. I feel exactly the same as my Honourable Indian friends do feel. I wish to say that retaliation is not justice, but a sign of narrow-mindedness, which we should not forget. Indians are an old civilized people; the civilization of Europe is of comparatively recent origin. We cannot expect that these youngsters with faces like Japanese dolls

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: May I rise to a point of order. Do these remarks refer to my amendment or any other?

Mr. Muhammad Yamin Khan: May I ask what faces like Japanese dolls have got to do with it?

Khan Bahadur Zahiruddin Ahmed . . . will suddenly be as high minded as we Indians,—the oldest people on the face of the earth,—were, are or can be. A Persian poet says, if you have received a wrong from an equal or a superior party, you can repay him with another wrong; you may return ill for ill. But if you be a really superior party to him you are to return good for ill so that the perpetrator of the wrong may feel ashamed and naturally he will not do you any more wrong. The Indians have always been a magnanimous people. Why should we forget it on such an occasion? Let us rise up to our standard before the whole civilized world and show that we are a fair and broad-minded and superior people and know more how to give than to take. I am certain that in the course of time, which may be a few years, our magnanimity will be fully appreciated and the drawbacks placed on the Indians in the Colonies and elsewhere will soon be removed

Mr. President: The Honourable Member is getting out of order again.

Khan Bahadur Zahiruddin Ahmed: I am certain that the public opinion of the whole outside civilized world will be arrayed on our side, which sooner or later will force the Colonists to give in. I ask my countrymen to be as magnanimous as they have always been.

Mr. Muhammad Yamin Khan: This is a speech on the last amendment; we have nothing to do with the colonies in this one.

Mr. President: The House is well aware of it; I pulled him up before.

Khan Bahadur Zahiruddin Ahmed: Sir, I regret my mistake. I was out of the Assembly Hall and just returned. I was under the impression that the discussion is still going on on the old amendment. Hence I offer you my apology. I ask my countrymen to be magnanimous as they have always been. I now ask my Honourable friend to withdraw his amendment.

The motion that clause 5 be omitted was negatived.

Rai Bahadur Bakshi Sohan Lal: Sir, the amendment I propose refers to the same clause, clause 5. It is as follows:

"For clause 5 substitute the following clause:

'5. In sub-section (i) of section 29 of the said Code, the words and figures 'subject to the provisions of section 44' shall be omitted'."

Mr. President: May I point out to the Honourable Member that two questions arise on this amendment. First of all, we have just decided not to omit clause 5 and we cannot substitute his clause 5 for the existing clause 5. We have further already amended the words which he proposes to amend during the proceedings on the Bill to amend the Code of Criminal Procedure, and the words now read "subject to the other provisions of this Code."

Rai Bahadur Bakshi Sohan Lal: There is one thing I wish to say. The effect of my amendment would be that it does away with section 29A as proposed and, though it has been negatived on the motion of Mr. Agnihotri, I respectfully submit that, if there are any such Magistrates, as has been suggested, who would be influenced by a European party, why not do away with such Magistrates and improve the Magistracy.

Mr. President: To what question is the Honourable Member addressing his remarks?

Rai Bahadur Bakshi Sohan Lal: That clause 5 of the Bill be omitted.

Mr. President: We have already decided not to omit it and therefore we cannot substitute his clause for it. Moreover, even if he were to put it in a different form, we have already decided this Session that the words 'subject to the provisions of section 447' shall not stand part of the Code but other amended words.

Rai Bahadur Bakshi Sohan Lal: Then, I will withdraw this amendment.

The amendment was, by leave of the Assembly, withdrawn.

Mr. B. Venkatapatiraju: Sir, my amendment would only be necessary if amendment No. 19 is passed; otherwise it is not necessary.

Mr. President: If the Honourable Member intends to move amendment No. 15, we will take it after No. 19.

Dr. H. S. Gour: Sir, I shall very briefly recapitulate the reasons which have induced me to give notice of this amendment.* I would invite the attention of the House to paragraph 22 of the report of the Committee where it is stated that "the majority are of opinion that sections 30 and 34 should be repealed on the ground that a sentence of more than two years' imprisonment should not be passed without the assistance of a jury or of assessors." In a very illuminating note penned by Mr. Justice Shah, appended to the report, he also in paragraph 10 (a), printed at page 24 of the report, points out that he was entirely opposed to the retention of section 30 on the Statute Book. Now, I shall very briefly point out what is the effect of the retention of section 30 and its consequential section 34 in the Code of Criminal Procedure. To my lay friends I may point out that under the present Code of Criminal Procedure all offences not punishable with death may be tried in provinces, where there exist Deputy Commissioners, by Magistrates of the first class empowered to try such cases; the result being that in several provinces, the majority of the Sessions cases not punishable with death are disposed of as mere Magisterial cases, with the result that there are no jury and no assessors and the trial is more or less in the hands of the Magistrate who performs the dual functions of a judicial officer and an executive officer. This question of asking the executive officer to discharge judicial functions in highly complicated cases requiring technical knowledge and skill and a certain amount of knowledge of the law has been the subject of adverse criticism in this country for a long time past and the Committee pointed out that the time had come when, with the advent of the jury system which the present Bill, if passed into law, will introduce, accused in districts and provinces where there exist Deputy Commissioners should not be deprived of the salutary aid which the jurors and the assessors give to the Court. If you will read the ensuing letters you will find that the then representatives of the Government were not unsympathetic towards our recommendations. I am moving this amendment with the first object of obtaining an official public pronouncement on the part of the present Home Member as to what the policy of the Government is regarding the repeal of section 30 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. So far as I understand, and I think those of you who have read the compilation will strengthen my view, that the view of the whole Committee was for an early repeal of sections 30 and 34 of the Code of Criminal Procedure, with the resultant effect that all Sessions cases not punishable with death shall be tried only in Sessions courts with the assessors or the jury as the case may be. Now, the Bill as drafted excludes from the cognizance of the Magistrates empowered under section 30 all European British subjects but does not, and indeed could not, exclude the British Indian subjects tried for the same offence. We were all of opinion, and I am of opinion still, that we do not wish that this obsolete anachronism of a system of asking Magistrates to dispose of cases of this gravity and heinousness should be perpetuated by allowing them to try European British subjects equally with British Indian subjects. So far we are all agreed. But at the same time we want a definite assurance from the Honourable the Home Member that this obsolete system will not be enured and perpetuated longer than it is necessary in the interests of justice. In the compilation which is accessible to us we find that some objection is taken to the change of system on the ground of expense.

Well, Sir, I have no doubt that if we are to revise our Criminal Procedure and if we are to level up, as this Bill proposes to do, our Indian subjects, and bring them alongside of European British subjects, then I submit some measure of reform on the lines indicated by me should be adumbrated by the occupants of the Treasury Benches. If they do so, I am not anxious to press for the deletion of clause 6 which I think, as a temporary measure, is a good one, because I have myself condemned the system of magisterial trials of cases not punishable with death, and having condemned that system, I could not, in consistency, ask that for the time being that that system be equally extended to European British subjects. Indeed, if I were inclined to take a leaf out of the note book of my esteemed friend, the occupant of the Treasury Bench, I would have said, as he has said in his opening remarks, that the unification of Criminal Procedure, where the two systems are assimilated and the same system applies equally to European British subjects and British Indian subjects, would lead to a steady and speedy improvement of our judicial machinery. If I wanted to use that as a lever for hastening up the pace of judicial reform in this direction, I would insist upon the deletion of this clause so that our fellow sufferers, the European British subjects, may join with me in asking for the early deletion of that clause. But I do not think I require that reinforcement, and I shall therefore rest content if an assurance is given by the Honourable the Home Member that this clause will engage his early attention and that it shall be purged out of the Statute Book at the earliest moment possible.

Mr. President: Amendment moved;

"Omit clause 6."

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Some part of the assurance for which Dr. Gour asks I can, of course, give him, namely, that we shall at once take action to address the Local Governments in whose provinces this section applies, and ask their views why the recommendations of the Committee should not be carried out, namely, that section 30 should be withdrawn from operation. I cannot, of course, give a promise, for it will be impossible for me to do so, that this section will be withdrawn entirely at an early date. We must first consider the opinions of the Local Governments and the High Courts, and know what they have to say on the subject. The matter is of importance to Local Governments if only on the point of finance. I have here figures of the number of persons sentenced by Magistrates in the Punjab with special powers under section 30. They appear to amount in the years 1919-1921 to an average of some 1,193 cases. If those cases were tried by Sessions Judges, obviously there must be a large increase in the judicial cadre. Some 8 to 10 Sessions Judges would be required, and it is quite obvious that in a matter of this kind we must take into consideration what the Local Governments have to say as regards their ability to find finance for the measure. I hope Dr. Gour will be satisfied with my assurance that we do not intend to let the matter rest, and that we shall immediately address Local Governments on the matter.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: It is in this matter and one other matter that the co-operation of the European community in this country is needed. In two matters we condemned the question whether it was necessary to create equality between the two races. One is in regard to the sentence of whipping and the other is the extraordinary power vested in certain Magistrates to impose this very heavy sentence without a trial in a Sessions Court. If we were to work up to equality in all matters, we should have insisted upon European British subjects also being amenable to the same jurisdiction as Indian subjects are. So also in the case of whipping. But we felt that we must not work up to equality in injustice. Let us have equality only in justice. This we felt to be an injustice and therefore let us fight our battle by working for justice and not impose this injustice on the European British subjects also. It is in this spirit that we approached this question and we ask for the co-operation of the European Members in removing these blots from the sections of the Criminal Procedure Code. Our European non-official colleagues on the committee supported us very strongly in this matter in making the recommendation both as regards whipping and as regards this particular question. Unfortunately they are not here. I hope those European Members who are present here will not be led away by the specious argument which oftentimes misleads them, namely, the threat of increased cost, the increased number of people whom you will have to employ. I say it is worth paying for. You cannot have this machinery because you find it costly.

This is no argument for having insufficient tribunals trying and sentencing people to long terms of imprisonment. Let the accused people have a fair trial at any cost and I do not think we should be misled by any such argument. I am not satisfied with the way in which the Honourable the Home Member has treated this question. I know the Honourable Sir William Vincent had laid more emphasis on this than the present Home Member does. I hope he will also work himself up into enthusiasm in this matter and see that before the year is out these two disparities do disappear from our Statute Book.

Mr. P. E. Percival (Bombay: Nominated Official): I wish to make one remark with reference to the observation made by Mr. Rangachariar, that the committee were unanimous on the question of sections 30 and 34. The suggestion made by my friend Dr. Gour was also that the Committee were unanimous on this point. But that was not so. The report says:

"The majority of the Committee are of opinion that sections 30 and 34 should be repealed, on the ground that a sentence of more than two years' imprisonment should not be passed without the assistance of a jury or assessors. Dr. Sapru and Sir William Vincent consider that the Government of India must ultimately be guided in a large measure by the opinions of the Local Governments and the High Court on the question whether it is practicable to repeal those sections. Some members of the committee are of opinion that, if, after inquiry, it is decided to retain these sections, they should apply equally to Europeans and Indians."

I wish to point out that some only of the Members of the committee held the above view, though they were unanimous on the point that the matter was a suitable one for inquiry. I submit that Government have acted exactly in accordance with the proposal put forward by the Committee. That was the only point I wished to mention.

Dr. Nand Lal: In the interests of equality of treatment and uniformity of procedure I am in favour of the recommendation which was made by the Honourable Mr. Justice Shah. He has very clearly and in unmistakeable terms made out this case that sections 30 and 34 of the Criminal Procedure Code may be repealed at once and the understanding which has been very kindly given by the Honourable the Home Member is not very satisfactory. This recommendation may be accepted at once and with your permission I will invite the attention of the House to the luminous manner in which that recommendation has been made by the Honourable Judge. He says: "the only other alternative is to repeal it. I think the section deprives an accused person of many important safeguards which he has in cases triable by the Sessions Court." Then he says that "it deprives the accused of a jury or assessors, and it substitutes a District Magistrate or a first-class Magistrate specially empowered by the Government for a Sessions Judge, an Additional Sessions Judge or an Assistant Sessions Judge. A District Magistrate or a first class Magistrate specially empowered may not be, oftentimes would not be, an exclusively judicial officer like the Sessions Judge or the Additional Sessions Judge or the Assistant Sessions Judge and would not ordinarily be an officer of the same rank and judicial training as the latter. By investing the District Magistrate or a first-class Magistrate with such extensive powers under the Code, the accused are deprived of some of the most effective safeguards in a criminal trial in a Sessions Court." Again, that learned Judge says, "I do not see how its retention can be justified except on the grounds of administrative convenience." It has, now, been propounded by the Honourable Home Member,—that there will be a large number of cases and therefore, in the first place, it will be very expensive, in the second place, it will be difficult to have all these cases, which are being in these days decided by the Magistrates empowered under section 34, to be tried and decided by the Sessions Judges

Mr. President: Order, order. I allowed Dr. Gour to pursue that line because, having read the Report of the Committee, I thought it might be desirable, even if a little disorderly, for Government to give a public pronouncement; but I cannot allow the Honourable Member now to go on arguing the merits of the case which I ruled out of order in the case of Mr. Bakshi Sohan Lal.

Dr. Nand Lal: Then I will not go into these details. I do not know how the elimination of new section 6 will really serve the purpose which my Honourable friend, Dr. Gour, wishes to see served, because, if that clause 6 is taken away altogether, it will not, in any way, repeal these two sections. Therefore, though I quite agree with the spirit of his amendment, I am sorry I cannot support it; but I would, however, suggest to the Honourable Home Member that he will kindly see that these two sections 30 and 34 may be repealed at the earliest possible date. (Voices: "I move that the question be now put.")

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: The question is that clause 6 be omitted.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. B. Venkatapatiraju: Sir, we are told that the Government of India are anxious to carry into effect the recommendations of this Committee on which Europeans and Indians were well represented. In this case, Sir, what was recommended by that Committee? So far as whipping is concerned, the majority of the Committee considered that that punishment should apply to Europeans and Indians if retained alike. Therefore, the question is whether whipping should either be retained for Europeans and Indians alike or should be removed altogether; and to disabuse the minds of my European colleagues, I may say that in this or in any other amendment, I never wanted to suggest any reduction of the privileges which are provided in the Bill introduced by the Government. What I want to do and what I attempt to do in my amendment is to raise the position of Indians to the level of the Europeans in the enjoyment of privileges under this Bill. That is my main object. In order to effect that I submit that the Government of India should not be satisfied with abolishing whipping against Europeans only at this juncture and considering the question further in regard to Indians. I think that is maintaining an invidious distinction. It is to avoid that that I have moved this amendment. And though I move the whole amendment, I request, Sir, that it may be put to the House in parts. My amendment is:

"(a) In clause 6, in proposed section 34A, clause (a), omit the word 'European'"

My object in omitting the word "European" is that I have provided elsewhere that the only privilege allowed to a European in this connection is that he should not be tried by a second or third class Magistrate. Therefore by omitting the word "European" nobody suffers, because then it would apply to all British subjects equally. My amendment goes on:

"and omit the word 'death, penal servitude or'."

It states further:

"(b) In clause 6, in proposed section 34A(b), omit the word 'European', substitute the words 'one year' for the words 'two years' and add the following at the end:

'No Magistrate of the second class shall pass any sentence other than imprisonment which may extend for three months or fine which may extend to two hundred rupees or both; and no Magistrate of the third class shall pass any sentence other than imprisonment which may extend to one month or fine which may extend to fifty rupees or both'."

Now these are the definite suggestions which may be taken up separately but my main object is that if a European is not to be whipped for any offence committed by him, I think the same privilege should be enjoyed by an Indian who commits a similar offence. If you want to consider the matter further, by all means do so. But I appeal to you to keep this section out until the inquiry into the matter has been settled. There is no reason for haste in abolishing whipping for Europeans; and in that event also the Government will not feel the imperative necessity of bringing it against Indians. There must be a certain amount of pressure on the part of Europeans in favour of the abolition of this punishment, because they do not wish such a degradation should be applied to Europeans. Therefore I suggest, Sir, that whipping should be abolished. If the Government wish to move an amendment in this connection somewhere else, that is a different matter. They might say that they are considering the case of juvenile offenders. But I think there are also European juvenile offenders, and why should they not be punished in the same way? Therefore I appeal to my European colleagues that, if they are so very attached to the recommendations of the Joint Committee, they should stick up for the abolishing of whipping altogether in the case of both communities or retain it for both. Otherwise this will be misunderstood by the people. Let us be fair to both sides. I do not wish to say anything further about whipping.

I suggest further that both in the case of Europeans and Indians the death sentence is not at all desirable. Because when once you take life you cannot bring it back, and there may be occasions when there are judicial murders for which there is no hope of rectification. After all, what is the object of having death sentence? It is as a deterrent, and there are reasons urged that persons who commit offences liable with the punishment of death are doing it not being deterred at all by any section provided in the Code. I only invite, Sir, to what was stated by Buckley on Civilization. He states according to the environments of a population, according to the stage of civilization in a particular locality, a certain number of people invariably commit murder; whatever be your law, a certain number of people will commit murder, just like certain number of people commit suicides and certain number of people marry in a certain month. These are natural laws, whatever be your view. (Laughter.) You might laugh because you do not understand the underlying social principle which has been found by scientists. If you examine the cases in any country for a number of years, you will find that at a certain stage a certain number of people will commit a certain number of offences, whatever be the law; a certain proportion of people will marry and a certain number of people will commit suicide; if you examine the statistics, you will see the truth of this assertion. Such being the case what is the necessity for having death sentence? I leave it to you, Sir, to decide whether it is desirable to have death sentence. I state in my proposal that death sentence should be removed from the Sessions

[Mr. B. Venkatapatiraju.]

Courts. It serves double purpose. It removes the necessity of the Secretary of State or the Home Government giving any sanction for any law that we pass. Therefore, if death sentence is removed from Sessions Courts, that right of intrusion into our domestic matters will be removed. Besides, after all, it is not a desirable state of things that, while it was not competent for Sessions Judges to pass death sentence before on Europeans, it should be introduced now. I do not want that Europeans should be subjected to death sentence by a Sessions Judge. If there is such a serious offence, be he an Indian or a European, he should be tried by a High Court. (Dr. H. S. Gour: "The death sentence is always passed by the High Court. It is always subject to confirmation by the High Court.") It is very well known that death sentences are subject to confirmation by the High Court. I am speaking about the trial, because much depends upon the atmosphere in which a person is tried with the jury taken from the mofussil or the metropolis. Therefore, my suggestion is that the death sentence might be removed. The third suggestion is about removal of penal servitude. It has been suggested, that it is going to be abolished, and that there is going to be a Bill about it. Therefore, there can be no difference of opinion, because it was stated long ago that the Government is going to abolish Andaman as a place for penal servitude. I do not know when they propose to pass the law. One strong point is that we do not want this penal servitude as a punishment at all. I would, therefore, suggest that both Europeans and Indians should not be subjected to the death sentence or penal servitude. I do not press for the reduction from six months to three months. That proviso goes. I only confined myself in moving the amendment to these things, namely, that whipping should be abolished, and that death sentence and penal servitude should be abolished. Therefore, I move my amendment, Sir, which is as follows:

"In clause 6, in proposed section 34A, clause (a) omit the word 'European' "

If this is passed, section 34 might be added there, so that no European will subject himself to be tried by second and third class Magistrates. Therefore, whatever privileges he has, he will continue to have, along with Indians. With that object in view, I move my amendment.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Halley: We are I think dealing (as Mr. Raju desired) with the amendment in two parts. So far you have put to us only that part which refers to the omission of the word "European". I understand Mr. Raju's object in omitting this word is to make the European subject, like the Indian, to whipping. He says if Europeans really feel the attachment they have expressed to the recommendations of the Racial Distinctions Committee's Report they should heartily support him in doing away with whipping. But I would remind him that the Racial Distinctions Committee's report did not propose to do away with whipping. They said public opinion should be invited on the question of whipping, in particular whether the punishment should not be confined to persons mentioned in section 4 of the Whipping Act and also in the way of school discipline to juvenile offenders. The minority of the Committee were in favour of the complete abolition of whipping except in the case of juvenile offenders. The majority recommended that if whipping was retained, Europeans should be equally subject to it. The suggestion was, not that whipping should be immediately abolished by the Legislature, but that inquiry should be made on these lines. Those inquiries we are, Sir, about to make . . .

Dr. H. S. Gour: About to make? In July you promised to make them. May I remind the Honourable Member that in Mr. Tomkinson's letter of the 20th July 1922, it is said that separate references will be made to Local Governments on the following matters—section 30 and whipping. It is a matter of eight months.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey : That is perfectly true. These inquiries were to be made as the result of the publication of the Report of the Racial Distinctions Committee. I may remind the Honourable Member that that Report was only very recently published, and the inquiries have not yet been made. He may rest assured they will now be made as soon as the House has passed this Bill. If I am not speaking with enthusiasm on the subject, the absence of which Mr. Rangachariar deprecated in regard to the proposed abolition of the operation of section 30, it is only because I have a natural sense of caution in the matter. I do not like to engage, on the part of Government, definitely to carry out any measure of this kind until the Local Governments, who are vitally concerned, and the High Courts have been consulted on the subject; and I suggest that it is better to wait for the result of the investigations which we are about to make than to deal piecemeal with the proposition as suggested by Mr. Raju.

Mr. Muhammad Yamin Khan : Sir, as far as the question of whipping is concerned, I even deplore that it should be taken away in the case of European criminals. I do not want to enter into long details on this question, but I think from my experience at the Bar that the sentence of whipping is usually given only in those cases where the crime is not only a crime but it is coupled with cruelty. Most judges shirk passing sentences of whipping

Dr. H. S. Gour : Petty thefts are punished with whipping.

Mr. Muhammad Yamin Khan : But thefts of a particular nature. But in cases like those under section 376 of the Indian Penal Code where a person has committed an offence against a girl of tender years, say three, four or five years of age and the man is found guilty, would the House say that a sentence of whipping should not be passed on such a man? I think in these rare cases there should be a sentence of whipping on the man who commits a crime of this nature. I would not like this punishment to be taken away from even an European if he commits that kind of brutal crime. Here by taking away the word "European" my friend wants that where a society is protected by this law only, where only corporal punishment has got more force than imprisonment in jail, this punishment should be taken away. Take the case of a village society, where young girls work in the fields and go about unprotected. Supposing a man of this brutal kind of nature commits a crime to whom the punishment of whipping alone is deterrent. What other punishment could be awarded to a man who is a labourer, an ordinary man, a jail bird, who would much rather be in jail than outside? For him there is no other punishment than corporal punishment. Whipping is the only kind of punishment for this class of people. I do not see how this House can ignore these facts. I totally disagree with my friend, Mr. Venkatapatiraju on this point that whipping or solitary confinement should be taken away. Both these punishments should remain as a sort of deterrent punishment for this special kind of cases.

With these words, I oppose the amendment.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"In clause 6, in proposed section 34A, clause (a), omit the word 'European'."

The motion was negatived.

Mr. President: Further amendment moved:

"Omit the words 'death, penal servitude or'."

The motion was negatived.

Mr. President: Further amendment moved:

"In clause 6, in proposed section 34A, (b), omit the word 'European'."

The motion was negatived.

Mr. President: Further amendment moved:

"Substitute the words 'one year' for the words 'two years'."

The motion was negatived.

Mr. President: I do not think the Honourable Member moved the rest, did he?

Mr. B. Venkatapathiraju : No, Sir.

Mr. President: Amendment No. 15 falls as the result of these decisions.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri : Sir, I move:

"That in clause 6 in the proposed section 34A (b) for the words 'two years or fine which may extend to one thousand rupees', substitute the words 'such period or such amount of fine as he be empowered under the said Code'."

Sir, much has already been said by Dr. Gour on this point in the previous amendment which was moved by him and it would not have been necessary for me to move this amendment but I am obliged to do so because of the observations of the Honourable Mr. Percival. Here, Sir, the Committee proposed that the provisions of law under sections 30 and 34 should be repealed and, so long as that provision had not been repealed it should extend equally to both European and Indian British subjects. Government, on the other hand, promise that they are prepared to make inquiries and that they will decide about it after they have received the opinions of the Local Governments and of the High Courts. If the Government are going to make the inquiries, and, if they are not sanguine as to how far they will succeed in repealing that provision, it will be but proper that the recommendation of the Committee and the compromise be adhered to. Sir, when in support of amendments I base my arguments on the compromise then the argument proceeds on other lines. And when I base my arguments on other points, then it is said that the Joint Committee had recommended it on the basis of the compromise, that the Committee was representative of the people, there has been no outcry from the public against that report or the compromise. Sir, we were neither a party to the compromise nor were we a party to the selecting of the representatives on the Committee. No doubt all those gentlemen who were members of that Committee were very eminent lawyers and nobody would belittle their opinion. If the right to elect had been extended to us . . .

Mr. President: Order, order. The Honourable Member is delivering a speech which he ought to have delivered "on consideration" and not on an amendment.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: No, Sir. I am speaking

Mr. President: I am telling the Honourable Member that he is delivering a speech which he ought to have delivered on the motion that the Bill be now considered.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: I shall have to bow to your ruling on the point, Sir, but I am simply saying about the compromise, that there may be some people who may not accept that compromise on certain grounds, but still, as some of us have accepted that compromise, it should be strictly adhered to. It was because my amendment was based on it that I referred to the compromise and the constitution of the Committee. But as you have been pleased, Sir, to rule me out of order, on that point, I shall not trouble the House with further arguments on it. What I beg to submit now is that when the Committee had entered into a certain compromise, and when the Committee had made certain conditions on which the compromise was entered into, there is no reason for the Government to deviate from the conditions on which that compromise was based. All these conditions formed the basis of the compromise which retained certain rights and privileges for the European British subjects in the Code. It cannot be said that the compromise was on a particular matter only, but all the sides of the question of racial inequality

Mr. President: I have told the Honourable Member already that he is out of order and if he repeats his arguments, I shall order him to resume his seat.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: In these circumstances I will now only say that the Committee has recommended that these provisions should extend equally both to Indians and Europeans and I see no reason for removing those provisions until the existing law is repealed. I therefore move this amendment and if my amendment is accepted by the House, the provision will be retained in the Bill in the form in which the Committee had recommended it. With these words, Sir, I commend my amendment for the acceptance of the House.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"In clause 6, in the proposed section 34A (b) for the words 'two years or fine which may extend to one thousand rupees', substitute the words 'such period or such amount of fine as he may be empowered under the said Code'."

The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was negatived.

Rai Bahadur Bakshi Sohan Lal: Sir, the effect of my amendment is to add a new clause 6-A thus:

"6A. In section 188 of the said Code for the words 'Native Indian subject' substitute the words 'British Indian subject'."

Nowhere are the words "Native Indian subject" used and it is ambiguous whether "Native Indian subject" is the same thing as "British Indian subject" or an Indian subject of a Native State. We do not know what the words mean. If the word "Native" be omitted and for it the word "British" is substituted, the meaning will be quite clear. So I recommend that:

"After clause 6, the following clause be added:

"6A. In section 188 of the said Code for the words 'Native Indian subject' the words 'British Indian subject' be substituted."

Clauses 5 and 6 were added to the Bill.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"After clause 6 add the following clause:

"6A. In section 188 of the said Code for the words 'Native Indian subject' substitute the words 'British Indian subject'."

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: I do not raise the point whether this amendment was out of order, but it will be sufficient to say that it is exactly one of the points that can be dealt with in consolidation. It is a matter of verbiage. The same words are used, of course, in the Government of India Act, but if necessary they can be put right when we prepare our consolidating Bill.

The amendment was negatived.

Clauses 7, 8 and 9 were added to the Bill.

Mr. President: Clause 10. The Honourable Member (Mr. Agnihotri) proposes to raise in amendment No. 22, a question which appears to me to be outside the scope of the Bill. That question ought to be raised on some other measure dealing with general legal procedure and not in a measure of this kind where we are dealing with racial distinctions alone.

Clause 10 was added to the Bill.

Clauses 11 and 12 were added to the Bill.

Rai Bahadur Bakshi Sohan Lal: I move:

"For clause 13 substitute the following clause:

"13. Section 275 of the said Code shall be omitted'."

Section 275 is as follows:

"In a trial by jury before the Court of Session of a person not being an European or an American, a majority of the jury shall, if he so desires, consist of persons who are neither Europeans nor Americans."

What I want is that there should be no differentiation in trials as regards British Indian subjects and European British subjects. I submit that we ought to have juries chosen by lot and this section is unnecessary. Clause 13 runs as follows:

"(1) In a trial by jury before the High Court or Court of Session of a person who has been found under the provisions of this Code to be an European or Indian British subject, a majority of the jury shall, if such person before the first juror is called and accepted so requires, consist in the case of an European British subject, of persons who are Europeans or Americans, and in the case of an Indian British subject, of Indians.

(2) In any such trial by jury of a person who has been found under the provisions of this Code to be an European (other than an European British subject) or an American, a majority of the jury shall, if practicable and if such European or American before the first juror is called and accepted so requires, consist of persons who are Europeans or Americans."

I beg to submit that no such distinction ought to be made and I do not think that mixed juries would do any good except perpetuating the racial differences between the two communities. If there is a mixed jury, the Indian jurors will return a verdict in favour of the Indian accused and the European jurors will return a verdict in favour of the European accused. So, the better thing will be to select the jurors or assessors by lot as is provided in other provisions of the Code.

Dr. H. S. Gour: Sir, as I have also given notice of a similar amendment, the House will indulge me for a few moments if I explain the reasons which have prompted me in giving notice of my amendment and which incidentally, though partially supports the amendment of my friend, Bakshi Sohan Lal. Honourable Members will find that the Racial Distinctions Committee limited the privileges to British subjects. It inquired whether we were under any treaty obligations with the nationals of other European and American States which compelled us to discriminate the citizens of those countries as regards the procedure for trials in criminal cases. We were then told that there were no treaty obligations governing other European and American countries, and we therefore decided that so far as the non-British Europeans and Americans were concerned they must stand on the same footing as British Indian subjects and that we could not discriminate in their favour any more than we could discriminate in favour of ourselves or in favour of any other foreigner. That was the position. Now, if Honourable Members will turn to the Statement of Objects and Reasons appended to the Bill, they will find in paragraph 4, the following statement:

"It has since been ascertained that by treaties with Italy, Switzerland, Argentine, Venezuela, Costa Rica and Columbia the same privileges as regards procedure in criminal trials are secured in India to nationals of those countries as are given to Indian subjects of His Majesty."

We have to be very clear as to what these sentences mean because on inquiry from the Home Department I ascertained that the treaties which we may have entered into, or for the matter of that which the British Government may have entered into with these countries are not available, and if I understand it aright they were not available or accessible to anybody in the Government of India here. This is a short statement which reproduces a report received from the India Office. We are not therefore in a position to examine the treaties for ourselves and to see what were the stipulations made by the British Government or the Government of India with the countries concerned but the only information available to us is hearsay or second-hand information contained in a short report which is condensed in this paragraph. Now, let us be very clear as to what it means. Assume for the sake of argument, and I am making an assumption entirely favourable to the countries concerned, that we have entered into an international obligation with the countries named in this clause giving to the nationals of those countries the same rights as are given to Indian subjects of His Majesty. If we have entered into those obligations, surely, Sir, those obligations could not, by any fiction of law or analogy, be extended to the whole continent of Europe and to the whole of America. Treaty obligations with those small States like Switzerland, Argentine, Venezuela, Costa Rica and Columbia, and Italy, of which the nationals in this country probably will number a few hundreds,—a few of them will perhaps be rare specimens, for I do not think that there are any nationals from Columbia or Costa Rica in this country; if there are, my friends on the other side of the House will be able to enlighten the House about them. Now the first question I wish to raise before this House is this: if we have treaty obligations with the nationals of these specified countries, we are bound to respect the treaty obligations and incorporate them in our Bill, but what justification have you for extending the same preferential privileges to people with whom you have no treaty obligations? Under the clause as it is embodied in the Government of India Bill, a Frenchman, a German, a Russian, an Hungarian, a Spaniard or a Portuguese will claim, if practicable, a jury of his own countrymen and an American (Voices: "No, no,—a European jury.) There is a contradistinction: you have on the one side, as my friends said, the Europeans in contradistinction and perhaps in contrast to the Europeans, you have the British Indian subjects. This distinction, an invidious distinction between an European and an American on the one hand and a British Indian on the other hand has been perpetuated and stereo-typed in this Bill, and therefore I say that we shall not allow you to advance one inch further than what your treaty obligations compel us to do. Surely, Sir, when we were not responsible for the legislation of this country, and when we were in a minority, the Government of India could place upon the Statute Books anything that they wanted; the executive were identified with the legislative machinery; but now, with the majority of the people's representatives in this House, are you prepared to perpetuate those galling and invidious distinctions between class and class, between Europeans and Indians, between Americans and Indians? Surely no high policy need interfere here with the display of your common sense and sense of fairness. My friends have been appealing to us, 'let the Colonials, either out of a spirit of magnanimity on our part or out of a feeling of helplessness, retain their rights,—may, even enlarge their rights,' but what justification have you got for including all Europeans and all Americans in that privileged and charmed circle when we have no longer treaty obligations with any of them, excepting only a few which have been mentioned in paragraph 4? I am quite sure what will be the reply from the Government Benches: have you not heard such a word as 'comprehensive exactness,' 'compendiousness'? For the purpose of avoiding enumeration, for the purpose of not having to describe them by their names, it is much better to drive into one wide net the whole lot of Europeans and the whole lot of Americans. But are we prepared to subscribe to this doctrine that people with whom we have nothing to do, people with whom we have been waging war and for whom our country has shed blood—are we prepared to give them a place of honour and privilege which is claimed by the European British subject and which we have given to him? I say, Sir, that this House must rise against any perpetuation of privilege in favour of non-British Europeans and Americans. Why should they not take their trial as ordinary people? I have pointed out and I repeat it that on first principles, on the ground of international justice, on the ground of equity, on the ground of international law, no man has a right to come here to this country, suck nutrition therefrom and when he commits an offence against the laws of the country, to claim immunity from the ordinary procedure which is laid down by the law of this land, and to say, "I claim a special privilege. I claim a higher right. I stand for the right which I possess of a trial by a jury of European and American colorists." What right I submit has he got? Every lawyer and every school-boy knows that it is one of the elementary principles of law that any person who goes to reside in a country makes himself prima facie liable to the lex loci or to the general laws of the land. If I or you or anybody went to Spain or to France or to Germany, he would be subject to the laws of Spain, of France and of Germany. No one will hear you there if you claim to be tried by the special procedure which is enacted in India or ask for any special privilege which does not obtain there or is not available to the citizens of those countries. But when those people come to this country should this Assembly, the representatives of the people, place them on a higher pedestal and give them rights they are not ordinarily entitled to, which are not justified by international law, which are not justified by the comity of nations? That is the question to which you have to address yourself. I say that you should not give away a great principle while you have the chance. This is a principle which you must fight and struggle for, namely, equality of treatment as regards the people with whom you have no treaty rights, as regards the people with whom you have no treaty obligations. I am prepared to except Switzerland, the Argentine and the countries enumerated in paragraph 4. But I submit that there is no reason that I have been able to see and no reason has yet been given, why all the populations of the Continents of Europe and America should be placed on the same footing as the people enumerated in paragraph 4. I submit therefore, Sir, that this is a point upon which the House must unanimously give its opinion that it will not extend the rights and privileges, by analogy or for the sake of convenience or compendiousness of expression, to people with whom we have no treaty rights and who are ordinarily subject to the laws of the land. I entirely support my friend, Mr. Bakshi Sohan Lal's amendment to this extent that I have mentioned: and I particularise it. I hope, Sir, no hypercriticism of Mr. Bakshi Sohan Lal's amendment, no verbal criticism of the inaptitude of the words or expression on the part of the Treasury Bench will make us sacrifice this great and essential principle for which he and I are struggling here. I hope the Honourable the Home Member will assist us. My friend, Mr. Rangachariar, charged him for some lukewarmness on a matter upon which this House felt very strongly. He said the reason why he was lukewarm and did not display any degree of enthusiasm was because it is born of caution necessary in the holder of a high office in the Government of India. I quite understand it, Sir, but let the Home Member remember that he is under no obligation to the people with whom neither the British Government nor the people or the Government of this country is under any treaty obligation. He must assist us and he must, I submit, narrow and restrict the number of exemptions as far as it is possible for the purpose of meeting the national sentiment voiced by the people here. I hope, Sir, that no criticism of the language of my friend, Mr. Bakshi Sohan Lal, or of the other authors of the amendment will stand in the way of the acceptance of the principle, for which he and I and a great many of the Members of this House are contending, and I therefore support Mr. Bakshi Sohan Lal's amendment to the extent I have indicated.

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: I am not proposing to speak on Mr. Bakshi Sohan Lal's amendment for a simple reason, his proposal, just like his previous amendments and just like his subsequent amendments, goes entirely against the terms of the compromise. Following therefore the procedure adopted by me hitherto in regard to his amendments, when once I had ascertained the feeling of the House on the subject of the compromise, I shall therefore pass by the matter in silence and leave it to the vote of the House. I am, however, in dealing with the support which it found in Dr. Gour, in a somewhat difficult position. Dr. Gour described Mr. Bakshi Sohan Lal and himself as equally fighting for a great principle. Yet, as far as I am able to ascertain, Dr. Gour himself does not like Mr. Sohan Lal propose to do away with a mixed jury for the European British subject. That then cannot be the great principle for which they are both fighting, although that is the great principle which is embodied in Mr. Bakshi Sohan Lal's amendment. So I must look elsewhere for the reason which inspired Dr. Gour. Now, he has taken us to one item only in the clause, namely, the position of the American and the European who is not a European British subject. He says that the Racial Distinctions Committee was told there were no treaties existing which would compel it to maintain what I may briefly describe as section 460 Rights. At the time the treaties had not been traced, but it was indicated to the Committee that there might be such treaties, and the Committee accordingly recommended as follows:

[Sir Malcolm Hailey.]

"We are of opinion that, unless any of the privileges in regard to such persons are found to be based on treaty, they should be abolished."

We have now ascertained both the number of nations to which treaties of this kind apply, namely, six, and we have just received a copy of one of these treaties. We are attempting to obtain others. It is quite clear from the treaty which I hold in my hand, namely, that with Italy, that we are obliged to maintain the existing section 460 Rights.

I take it that the House will be satisfied that in regard to those six countries at all events, the rights formerly held by Europeans and Americans under section 460 of the Criminal Procedure Code must be maintained. Dr. Gour asks us why and by what right and by what species of justification they should be extended to all Europeans and Americans? He suggests that I may defend this extension by the use of the word "compendiousness." I do not intend to do so. I put it to the House as a matter of reason that if you are to maintain these rights in regard to Italy and Switzerland among the European nations, it would be difficult to defend their withdrawal in regard, say, to France, our late Ally, or any other nation in Europe now enjoying them. There is little doubt in my mind that if other nations, shall we say the French, were to approach us with a view of making a treaty identical with Italy, we should find it very difficult to resist their request. The same with Spain or Portugal, and the like, and we should gradually come back to what we have embodied in our Bill. Perhaps for the moment you might make an exception of Germany; perhaps even we might exclude Russia. That might be the case; I will not prejudice it, but the reason why we have applied to all Europeans the rights which are enjoyed by the Swiss and Italians among the European nations is I think perfectly obvious.

Mr. B. Venkatapatiraju: Does it include Turks?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: My Honourable friend will not ask me at the moment to discriminate accurately between European or Asiatic Turks, but as far as Turks are a European nation, they will obviously be included. Obviously other nations have not felt it necessary to apply for a treaty similar to that of Italy.

Dr. H. S. Gour: Germany too?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: The Honourable Member need be under no apprehensions in regard to Germany as there are no Germans in India, and they are restricted from entering.

Dr. H. S. Gour: Russians?

The Honourable Sir Malcolm Hailey: Russians would have the rights. I would go so far as to say it is difficult to withdraw from any of the big European nations rights which you give to Italians or to Swiss. That is the sole argument and I give it to the House for exactly what it is worth. I think it is worth a good deal. You might pick out your undesirable nations, but it would be difficult to withdraw from the European nations as a whole rights which the Swiss and Italians already possess under section 460. If we withdraw those rights, we should obviously have immediate applications for special treaties and it would be difficult to resist those applications. However, those are the grounds.

But, Sir, we have also to consider the case of Americans. Now, with some of the less known States in America, namely, Venezuela, Costa Rica, Columbia, and so forth, we have these treaties. Now, here again, you must therefore maintain section 460 Rights in their favour; and is it at all reasonable that we should exclude the citizens of the United States from a similar privilege? It is not, therefore, merely for the sake of easy drafting as Dr. Gour suggests, but on sound grounds of reason that we have made those rights applicable to Europeans and Americans. (Dr. H. S. Gour: "Why don't you extend them to China by a parity of reasoning?") (Mr. N. M. Samarth: "They are not Europeans.") If the House wishes to give those rights to the Chinese, I should have no particular objection, but I do not see that the parity of reasoning applies in this case in any way. Dr. Gour accused us of a great and unnecessary extension of the rights secure to some countries by treaty. He refuses to believe that it is reasonable on our part to give 460 Rights, if I may so describe them, to all European nations and to Americans merely because we have given them to the Swiss or the Italians. I have attempted to justify this—whether I have done so or not, I leave it to the House to judge. What Dr. Gour has not justified, I think, is the definite proposal, contained in his amendment, namely, that, while admitting all Europeans without distinction to these rights, for that is the effect of his amendment, we should withdraw them from the citizens of the United States of America. Incidentally his amendment, I may add, would withdraw them also from the treaty countries in America, though perhaps he does not intend to do so. He cannot guide himself on his consistency for he has all along said specifically that he wishes to maintain treaty rights, but the effect of his amendment, which he supported with such fervour and force, is actually to admit to these 460 Rights all the countries of Europe and to withdraw them from the treaty states of America. And now finally, what are these extension rights, for the abolition of which Dr. Gour has invoked the assistance of the House? What are these very exceptional privileges? Let me take Dr. Gour's own amendment. In the first place, he would withdraw the word "American" from sub-clause (1) of section 275. The effect of this clause is that, if a European British subject is being tried, the jury must consist of Europeans or Americans, and, therefore, so strong are his feelings on the subject, that he would not allow even an American to sit as a jurymen to try a European British subject. Secondly, he would withdraw the rights given to Americans by sub-clause (2). But the single right that they have is this, that, if they do happen to be tried by jury—and, of course they can claim no special jury trial—then, that jury shall consist of Europeans and Americans. That, Sir, is the sole right; that is the right which you wish to take away from them on the ground that we have given an unreasonable extension of treaty rights. It is not, I think, worth while, all the trouble that Dr. Gour has taken in putting his case to the Assembly, and I regret I myself have equally had to take up the time of the Assembly, on so comparatively trivial a matter.

(Some Honourable Members: "Let the question be now put.")

The motion was adopted.

Mr. President: The question is:

"That for clause 13 substitute the following clause:

'13. Section 275 of the said Code shall be omitted'."

The motion was negatived.

Bhai Man Singh: I move, Sir:

"That in the proposed new section 275 for the words 'a majority' wherever they occur substitute the words 'In the case of a trial before a Court of Session at least one, and in the case of a trial before a High Court at least three persons.'"

The effect of my amendment, Sir, is instead of a mixed jury wherein the majority of the jurors are of the same nationality as that of the accused. I only substitute that in cases where there appears a lesser number of men of his nationality, he should make it up in the case of a Sessions trial by one and in the case of the High Court by three persons. The only objection that can be raised against the ordinary jury will be that the jurymen in certain cases may not be able to understand the ways and customs of the accused, and may not be able to know the temperament of the accused. Therefore it is necessary that he should have men of his own nationality on the jury. That is one reason why men of the same nationality as the accused should be retained on the jury. Keeping this point in view, I am suggesting this milder amendment to the so-called compromise. Of course it is rather an unpleasant task for me to voice a note of discord on this "all-thanks-giving day" on the compromise, of which we have been talking so much. But, Sir, it is more of a compromise than we had this morning. I compromise in the real sense of the word. A compromise, really speaking, is no compromise if it does not remove the real cause of grievance and perpetuates the very evil against which the public has been agitating. I hope to be excused, Sir, at this stage, if I point out that really speaking, the greatest cause of complaint against the present procedure has been the mixed jury system. I cannot describe its evil in a better way than has been done by my learned and Honourable friend Mr. Rangachariar who of course, I am really sorry to say, has not yet agreed to it. My friend says: "It is perpetuating the racial distinction whether it be for the Indian or for the European. The jurymen would go into the witness box as if he was representing a particular community. The chances of securing even limited justice will be greatly diminished." Further on, on the same page, 18, in the next column he goes on to say: "I doubt if it will afford any satisfaction to responsible public opinion in the country if the privilege of a mixed jury were to be acceded to Indians charged with crime."—I am really sorry to say that after all, he himself being one of the most responsible men has agreed to that,—"for it is difficult to conceive how failure of justice in the case of European accused would be compensated for by an enactment which is not calculated to advance further the ends of justice." I would request Honourable Members just to mark those words very carefully. I will request Honourable Members of this House to mark these words carefully:

"It is not calculated to advance the further ends of justice, but might possibly lead to a miscarriage of it in the case of Indian accused persons. Indians do not want equality in injustice and any attempt or compromise of that sort is likely to undermine all respect for the administration of criminal justice and for criminal courts in this country."

This, really speaking, gives in an epitome the very strong argument against the present proposals of the Bill. If we want equality with the British European subject, this should be done away with. You say you do away with the discrimination. We said that mixed juries have not been doing justice to the accused. You say, "All right. If you want to do away with discrimination, you also have mixed juries" so that the accused person may also be let off by a majority of the jurymen who are of his own nationality and who go there as men of his own nationality. It is one thing if a jurymen is selected as an ordinary functionary, but when I am selected as an Indian as against an European the position becomes different. I may draw the attention of the House not only to what my Honourable friend, Mr. Rangachariar has said, but to a good many other opinions expressed by very responsible authorities in India. First of all, I would draw the attention of the House to page 43 of this correspondence. This is the opinion of the Judges of the Lower Burma Court:

"The Honourable Judges are strongly of opinion that a provision whereby an accused, whether Indian or European, shall be entitled to claim a mixed jury, will inevitably increase the antagonism between the races. They can see no advantage whatever in the provision and consider that it will tend to create and perpetuate racial feeling. Jurymen, both European and Indian, in the circumstances will come to regard themselves merely as champions of their own race."

Not only that, Sir, but I may draw your attention to page 9 where you find the opinion of Mr. Justice Kumaraswamy:

"My view has always been that racial discrimination as regards criminal trials not only has no justification but has been the cause of a great deal of miscarriage of justice."

If men of eminence, if men of experience, men of light and learning like the Judges of the High Courts definitely hold the opinion that this sort of jury system has been the cause of a great deal of miscarriage of justice, I would ask the Honourable House to see how far they are prepared to stick to the so-called compromise or how far they have or have not a right to accept or refuse to ratify it. In this particular case I would request my Honourable friends not to ratify the compromise in toto, but to accept it only partially as I have submitted to the House. There has been a miscarriage of justice by this system up till now. Not only now, but for a long time the whole of the Indian population has been crying with one voice against this evil, and there is absolutely no reason why, when we want to do away with one evil, we should want to extend that evil to the Indians also. Personally, if my opinion were to be asked, I would say, "If you want to keep up the system of a mixed jury for the Europeans, if you say that the agitation would be so strong that Government, would be incapable of handling the situation, give it to them, but for God's sake, do not extend the evil to the case of the Indian accused." (A Voice: "They have got it now.") In certain cases we have not got it. We have got it only in the case of trial in Session Courts when the trial is by jury. I think at present a mixed jury in the case of Indians is practically negligible. Then again, Sir, if I were allowed to read other quotations given in this book, Honourable Members would see that times without number Judges of the High Courts, Judicial Commissioners, especially the Judicial Commissioner of Oudh and a good many other responsible persons have declared that the mixed system of juries has caused a good deal of miscarriage of justice and I see no justification absolutely why we should keep up the same evil which has given us so much trouble for such a long time. If a compromise is to be arrived at, it should be a fair compromise to remove the evil. I say if a European gentleman finds that the jury consists of all Indians, he can claim to have one or two Europeans in the jury in the Sessions Court, so that he may be able to give proper directions to other colleagues in the jury. The other point about this is that the terms of the Bill are not in accordance with the Committee's report. I do not know if I am right or wrong. My friend, Mr. Chaudhuri, says I am wrong. He says that in the Statement of Objects and Reasons

Mr. President: The Honourable Member had better leave the Statement of Objects and Reasons alone. He must confine his remarks to the substitution for the words "a majority" the words "In the case of a trial before a Court of Session at least one and in the case of a trial before a High Court at least three persons".

Bhai Man Singh: I am pointing out that the Bill as drafted is not on the lines of the report with proper safeguards. The report of the committee was :

"We recommend that in all jury trials in which the jury are not unanimous or in which the jury are unanimous but the Judge does not agree with the verdict of the jury both in the High Court and the Sessions Court an appeal should be on facts as well as on law."

Further on they wanted a change in sections 418 and 423 but I find that in the Bill no change has been effected.

Mr. President: The Honourable Member is going now much wider than he did before. He is discussing the question of appeals. I asked him to confine his remarks to the terms of his amendment.

Bhai Man Singh: I want to show that the principle of a mixed jury should not be adopted by this House. Therefore the House should adopt the amendment as it stands. I would request Honourable Members to see whether they are going to leave the law of a mixed jury as it stood before and be simply satisfied with the extension of the principle to the Indians as well, or whether, seeing the evil which has resulted from these mixed juries, they are going to adopt my amendment. With these remarks, I commend my amendment.

Mr. President: Amendment moved :

"That in the proposed new section 275, for the words 'a majority' wherever they occur substitute the words 'In the case of a trial before a Court of Session at least one, and in the case of a trial before a High Court at least three persons'".

The motion was negatived.

Mr. President: The question is that clause 13 stand part of the Bill.

Dr. H. S. Gour: Sir, I have to speak on clause 13.

Mr. R. A. Spence (Bombay-European): It has already been talked about.

Dr. H. S. Gour: I am rather surprised that my friend, Mr. Spence, who has been vouchsafed all the privileges which he asked for, should now try to muzzle me and to extend to the non-British Americans the privileges for which I at any rate hope

Mr. R. A. Spence: I ask the House if I tried to muzzle Dr. Gour to-day

Dr. H. S. Gour: I think my friend does not know the meaning of words. When I gave notice of my amendment, Sir, I immediately asked the Home Department to let me see the treaties or copies thereof, so that I might see as to what were the treaty obligations which were entered into with America and the other European States.

Mr. N. M. Samarth: On a point of order, Sir. No. 26 is the amendment on which he is speaking, and in that he only asked for the omission of the words 'or Americans' and 'or an American' wherever they occur, so that he retains Europeans who are not British subjects in the section.

Dr. H. S. Gour: I do not think my friend is the best judge of my intentions; he had better let me speak as to what I intended and then interrupt me if I am out of order. As I have pointed out, I wanted to examine all the treaties for myself and to see how far those treaties justified the preferential treatment accorded to the nationals of those nations mentioned in the Bill. I was equally clear that apart from the treaties entered into with these States, all Europeans and Americans outside the British Islands could not claim preferential treatment which has been given to them in the Bill. I say

Mr. President: I consider that that subject had been exhausted in the Honourable Member's previous speech. I do not quite see how he can bring forward a new argument relating to this subject which he has not already used, but perhaps he is ingenious enough to be able to do so.

Dr. H. S. Gour: I will do so, Sir, if you will give me the indulgence. I was told that these treaties were not available in India and that nobody in India had seen them. Fortunately, one such treaty has been unearthed, and the Honourable Home Member has read portions of it, and, you will remember, Sir, he said that other treaties might also be found. Now in view of the fact that these treaties are still being hunted for and are not available, I move, Sir, that you will allow me to move this motion which stands against my name to-morrow instead of to-day. It is 6 o'clock, and it will give me the time to read the Italian Treaty and the other Treaties which may be available to me. And I also beg to give notice to the Honourable the Home Member that I shall be at liberty to move for the deletion of the whole of clause 2 of the proposed section 275. That will be in consonance with my speech which I have already delivered and with the arguments I then advanced. I do not see why any European not being a European British subject or American with whom we are not under any treaty obligation should have preferential treatment accorded to him.

Mr. President: The Honourable Member is taking a line of argument which I told him he is not entitled to do. The Honourable Member knows that repetition comes under the Standing Order and this case seems to me to be a peculiarly flagrant one.

Dr. H. S. Gour: My object, Sir, is to ask for the adjournment of the House in order to enable me to read the treaties which might be made available to the Members. Not only have I the right to look at the treaties, but I expect there are other Members who would like to see the treaties. I therefore suggest that in view of the lateness of the hour you may be pleased to adjourn the debate till to-morrow. That is my motion. All that I have said was in support of the motion for the adjournment of the House.

Mr. J. Chaudhuri (Chittagong and Rajshahi Divisions: Non-Muhammadan Rural): I rise to a point of order, Sir. Dr. Gour refers to the Americans only and we understood that when he was speaking on Bakshi Sohan Lal's amendment he spoke on his own amendment and his amendment was practically exhausted . . .

Mr. President: I do not need the Honourable Member's assistance to explain that to the House. The House is well aware of it already. There is no question before the House except that clause 13 stand part of the Bill.

Clause 13 was added to the Bill.

Mr. B. Venkatapatiraju: I suggest, Sir, that it would be better if we adjourned now, because it is very late.

Mr. President: Is the Honourable Member feeling tired?

Mr. B. Venkatapatiraju: Yes, Sir.

Mr. President: If I do adjourn the House, and I have not yet said that I propose to do so, I must draw the attention of the House to the fact that in the last two hours a great deal of time has been wasted on amendments on which no other speeches were made except those by the Movers of the amendments, and on which none of the Movers of the amendments asked that the vote of the House should be taken. I warn Members that if they continue that I shall have to treat that proceeding as obstructive.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: On the point, Sir, which you have just been pleased to warn us, that is about the amendments which take up much of the time of the House, may I know, Sir, how it is possible for a Member—like myself for instance—who has certain amendments standing in his name, to know before he moves his amendment how the House will treat it.

Mr. President: Unless the Honourable Member is very hard of hearing he will easily learn the sense of the House. As far as the moving of his amendment is concerned I am not going to prevent it, and I shall give even a minority of one its full rights; but I must warn the House that I cannot allow individual Members to continue for long to take up the time of the House on matters in which apparently the House takes no interest.

Mr. B. Venkatapatiraju: Sir, the amendment which I propose to place for your consideration is 'to omit clause 14.'

The original section 264 in the Criminal Procedure Code says:

"When the trial is to be held with the aid of assessors, two or more shall be chosen, as the Judge thinks fit, from the persons summoned to act as such."

What the present Bill proposes is to make it compulsory that there should be not less than three assessors and if practicable there should be more. Now, it is not quite easy, Sir, in the mofussal to secure three assessors in every case. That difficulty was pointed out by two European civilians who are Commissioners. Now, you have got 2 assessors or more and this is elastic enough to secure more, when necessary, but to compel in every case that there should be three is unnecessary and undesirable. Perhaps, Sir, if the House thinks otherwise, I am not at fault, because I feel that it is undesirable.

Mr. President: Clause 14. Amendment moved:

"Omit clause 14."

The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: Sir, I beg to move:

"In clause 14 omit the words 'not less than three and if practicable.'"

In clause 14, Sir, we provide the number of assessors to be fixed and we provide that they shall not be less than three, and if practicable four. I do not understand, why these two numbers have been given there. Why should it not be that 4 assessors be selected? There is not much difference between 3 and 4. I therefore propose that it is better to drop the clause "not less than three and if practicable" and propose that in all the cases that are to be tried before the Sessions Judges with the aid of assessors, the number should be fixed at 4 definitely.

The amendment was negatived.

Clause 14 was added to the Bill.

Rai Bahadur Bakshi Sohan Lal: Sir, I move the following amendment which stands in my name:

"Omit clause 15."

Clause 15 adds another section after section 284 and the added section is proposed to be numbered as section 284-A. It is as follows:

"(1) In a trial with the aid of assessors of a person who has been found under the provisions of this Code to be an European or Indian British subject, if the European or Indian British subject accused, or, where there are several European British subjects accused or several Indian British subjects accused, all of them jointly, before the first assessor is chosen so require, all the assessors, shall, in the case of European British subjects be persons who are Europeans, or Americans or, in the case of Indian British subjects, be Indians.

"(2) In a trial with the aid of assessors of a person who has been found"

Mr. President: I think the Honourable Member may assume that we know the clause.

Rai Bahadur Bakshi Sohan Lal: The object of the amendment is to omit this provision altogether. I have been met in almost all the amendments by a statement on behalf of the Government that all these provisions have been framed in pursuance of the compromise effected, but I want to know who the persons effecting the compromise were. Were this Assembly as a body or persons specially selected by the general public of British India or were persons nominated by Government?

Mr. President: I have already told Members previously that matters of that kind are legitimate on the motion that the Bill be taken into consideration. They are not legitimate matters, excepting incidentally, on amendments of the detail.

Rai Bahadur Bakshi Sohan Lal: My objection is that if this be made the procedure in the administration of criminal justice, justice will be defeated in almost all the cases; possibly in exceptional cases justice may be done. In almost all the cases injustice will be done, and I respectfully submit that these provisions should be omitted and I do not consider myself bound by any compromise arrived at.

Mr. President: Amendment moved:

"Omit clause 15."

The question is that that amendment be made.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. B. Venkatapatiraju: Sir, I move:

"In clause 15 in sub-section (1) of proposed section 284A, for the words 'all the assessors' substitute the words 'one of the assessors' and make the necessary consequential changes."

The object of my amendment is this. It is true that European Members have agreed that the Sessions Court can try with reference to certain offences with the aid of assessors even Europeans who are charged before them. But what they want is that they should have a large number of assessors than usual and all of them shall be of the same persuasion. If our friends want miscarriage of justice, that is the surest way of getting it. But if they want justice, Sir, it will not do. I only appeal to them to refer to the opinions furnished, at pages 19, 22, and 29 of the opinions furnished to us. I may mention, Sir, that the Chief Justice of Allahabad remarked:

"In a very small European community this (that is the number of assessors) will not be obtainable and there will always be a danger of their unintentionally misleading the judge or worse still coming in Court full of local gossip and with unjudicial minds already more or less made up."

The opinion of a European is as follows:

"The opinion of assessors, and that is also very pertinent, except in very rare cases is negligible, and I do not think any advantage is to be obtained by increasing their number. It is enough if the accused is given the right of having one assessor of his nationality."

Now, if you want fair dealing, it means very little whether the accused is an European or an Indian. You must get a good idea of the circumstances of the case. Before this, even with reference to Europeans and Americans, whenever they are tried with the aid of the jury, or of assessors, it is enough

G.M. if half of them are Americans or Europeans. They never said all of them should be of the same persuasion. Why should they in this case say that all of them should be of the same persuasion? It is said "Oh, have you not given the same thing to Indians?" That is no case at all because in India it is impossible in particular cases where accused are tried, to secure Europeans. Almost all of them will be Indians. In the country you will find only Indians who are able to sit in almost all cases as assessors. But if you want to have four, as is suggested by the European gentleman in order to give their opinion, it does not carry any additional weight with the Judge. Therefore I would still recommend that it is enough for a European or an Indian to have one of his persuasion to be on the list of assessors, or as an alternative at least half the number. Therefore I move my amendment, Sir.

The motion was negatived.

Mr. K. B. L. Agnihotri: I beg to move:

"That in clause 15, in the proposed section 284A, for the words 'all the assessors' wherever they occur substitute the words 'two of the assessors.'"

In clause 14 we have already provided the number of assessors to be 8 or 4. In this clause we provide that the accused may ask for all the assessors to be of the same nationality or race to which he belongs. I beg to propose by my amendment that he may have the right to ask for only half of the number of such assessors to be of the same nationality. The House, by rejecting the amendment of the Honourable Bhai Man Singh, has testified that the mixed trial is not undesirable. It is often necessary that there should be trials by mixed jury or mixed assessors and I therefore propose that only half the number of the assessors should be of the same nationality as the accused. With this object I move that the words "two of the assessors" should be substituted for the words "all the assessors."

The motion was negatived.

Clause 15 was added to the Bill.

Rao Bahadur T. Rangachariar: Having regard to the importance of the Bill and the late hour, I appeal to you, Sir, and I hope the Honourable the Leader of the House will join me in my application, to adjourn the House. Speaking for myself, however anxious I may be to stay here, I feel tired and I cannot bestow sufficient thought to the subject before us.

Mr. President: The adjournment of the House is, as the Honourable Member knows, in the hands of the Chair, but I must necessarily, in the first place, consult Government as to the amount of business still to be considered, and, in the second place, the general convenience of Members. I must keep in view as the first consideration the state of the programme of public business which, I understand, the House desires to despatch. There is a very small margin of time left between now and the end of March, and, unless Honourable Members wish to sit well into April, they will have to pay some attention to the remarks which I made a little while ago about the time that is wasted in the moving of amendments which fail to receive any support. The Honourable Member (Mr. Rangachariar) has much influence in the ranks of his party, though he may not be its titular and official leader. Perhaps he may be able to use it to good effect in this matter.

The Assembly then adjourned till Eleven of the Clock on Tuesday, the 20th February, 1923
